I desire to be free to make good this faith, if that be possible. We want to be allowed, as best we can, to look facts everywhere in the face, and seek in all of them the ratification, if they can yield it, of this supreme hypothesis of the religious life. For I am convinced that if God is not everywhere, if He lives not in the moral world—not weakening its contrasts, but deepening them, lending a new glory and a wider reach to goodness, a more sorrowful significance to all wrong, and a new terror and pitifulness to sin—then He is not the God our souls want. We desire to be free to seek a God in whom our souls shall be satisfied, and who shall saturate us with His loving kindness; and I utterly mis-read the spirit of man if it can be satisfied with a God whose perfection is in any way limited, or without that knowledge of Him which shall fill the soul as "the waters cover the sea."

AFTER THE INTERNATIONAL. FURTHER WEST.

Ann Arbor, Oct. 3.—Seven hundred miles or so west of Boston, we are here for the Michigan State Conference, in which Universalists and others are taking cordial part with the Unitarians of the State. Four of us started together from Boston on Monday afternoon, Dr. Hunter, Professor Montet, of Geneva, the Rev. L. G. Wilson, who has taken up the secretaryship of the A.U.A. in succession to the Rev. C. E. St. John, and the writer of this letter. We found we had also on our train the Rev. A. M. Lord, of Providence, R.I., who, as vice-president, was to represent the Sunday School Society, and the Rev. A. I. Innes, of Sherwood, Mich., who now has charge of that and another small congregation belonging to the Conference. We all had places in the sleeping car, which by day was a pleasant roomy saloon and was to be our home for the next twenty-four hours.

It was a beautiful evening as we made our way westward out of Boston, through charming wooded country, and now and again past a quiet lake circled by the trees. Tired out by the great International week, it was delightful to sit in a quiet corner and look out upon the country as we glided past, dreaming New England dreams. Beyond Worcester and then Springfield, where we crossed the Connecticut river, we came (we were told) to still more beautiful country, and were among the Berkshire hills, amid which Channing breathed his last, but by that time it was quite dark, and our sleeping berths were made up for the night.

Then our thoughts turned back to Boston. And what memories we have of those days of the International! It was really impossible to send home any adequate account of those crowded days, or to make any adequate acknowledgment of the boundless kindness with which we were all received in Boston. Over two thousand, we were told at the time, was the number of those who registered as members of the Congress; but, as a matter of fact, we learnt afterwards that the number was close upon 2,500, if it did not actually go even beyond that. And among the most vivid impressions we have of that week is one of masterly generalship and organisation, under the presidency of Dr. S. A. Eliot, which rose, without any apparent effort, to meet unexpected demands and made everything go smoothly and pleasantly for the guests from many lands. Dr. Eliot and the Rev. W. Channing Brown, chairman of the reception committee, and indeed the whole army of helpers enlisted in the service, were unremitting in their kindness and thoughtful care for the visitors. And the generous hospitality and kindness of hosts in and about Boston, who received guests into their houses, have left memories, and friendships, not for the past only, which it will be very delightful to cherish.

The Friday excursion to Plymouth, with a call at Hingham on the way home (Sept. 27), brought the International Congress to a close with exactly the right emphasis. In the new Memorial Church of the First Parish (of which the late John Cuckson was minister) a service was held on the arrival of the party, in the course of which

Dr. Eliot spoke fitting words of the great memories attached to that place, and what they must mean to all friends of religious liberty. Pierpont's hymn, "Gone are the great and good," was sung, and also the following hymn, written for the occasion by the Rev. C. W. Wendte:—

From lands afar, with eager quest,
We gather, at the soul's behest,
Where once the Pilgrim Fathers trod,
To seek the city of our God.

Four-square with truth that city lies,
Its shining walls toward Heaven arise,
And its foundations, strong and sure,
In righteousness and faith endure.

Its gates stand open day and night,
While issuing from them, rayed in light,
A happy throng life's highways press,
With loving zeal to serve and bless.

O city, dreamed by ancient seer!
Our faithfulness must bring thee near;
Our toil and sorrow, hope and prayer,
Alone can lift thy walls in air.

Yet not to us, to Him the praise, [ways,
Whose strength sustains and guides our Till all the earth with awe shall own
The Master-Builder, God alone.

Burial Hill, at the foot of which the church stands, was afterwards visited, with the graves of Bradford, the first Governor, and others of the Pilgrim Company, and after that the National Monument, commemorating the labours, self-sacrifices, and sufferings for the cause of civil and religious liberty of the forefathers." Of the famous Plymouth Rock, protected as it is by a stone canopy, and lying away from the actual shore, it is more difficult to think with any realising sentiment; but one looks out upon the sea, and along the low-lying coast, and thinks what it must have meant to the men and women of the Mayflower to come ashore on that winter's day, and what their coming has meant in the history of New England and of religious progress since their day.

At Hingham the bells of the three Unitarian Churches and the Universalist Church were rung in welcome to the visitors, and at the old Meeting House an address of welcome was given by Mr. Francis H. Lincoln, clerk of the parish, and treasurer of the A.U.A. The Meeting House is a beautiful old place, built of timber in the colonial style, and it is the oldest place of worship now in use in the States. It dates from 1681. We have other memories of Hingham, of its quiet roads shaded by beautiful trees, of the old parsonage house and a pleasant gathering there for tea, and of a cordial farewell; but these and other memories of the stormy Sunday in Boston, which followed, and of Monday's Ministers' meeting, and more farewells, must remain unrecorded.

Our train travelled westward through the night. Towards sunrise we were passing through a level country, with low wooded hills bounding our view to the north-east, and, as the morning glow deepened, it was a luxury to lie in one's berth as the train hastened along, and watch the coming dawn, and then the full glory of the light, as the sun came up over the distant hill. Some good time after this it was that we reached Rochester, where we ought to have passed at 4.30 a.m.—two and a half hours late.

For us Rochester was more than a station to be passed, on account of the Rev. W. C. Gannett, who is minister there.

That the train should be so belated was matter, indeed, of annoyance, but of no great surprise to our American comrades. When at last we reached Buffalo our connection was missed, and there were we and our car stranded for no one could tell how long. So we breakfasted in peace, and sent post cards of Niagara to friends at home. At first they said the next train on to Ann Arbor went at 1.30; but finally we were tacked on to a couple of vans of a special express service, and rattled off at a great rate on our own account. Our train took the shortest way across the International Suspension Bridge at Buffalo, and so by the straightest way to Detroit. Thus we missed our expected glimpse of Niagara in crossing the river below the Falls, but made up time. Across that bit of Canada, on a straight road, we covered 47 miles in 45 minutes (so they said), and before long our whole train was being ferried across the broad stream on a huge ferry boat to Detroit. So after all we were less than three hours late in reaching Ann Arbor.

That evening the Michigan State Conference began with a religious service, and Dr. Hunter was the preacher; so it was a good thing we had arrived. Ann Arbor is a friendly little town, with broad roads, and pleasant avenues of trees along them all, while the grounds of the houses are unfenced and open to the road. It is the seat of one of the finest Universities of America, well supported by its State, with some 4,000 students, a considerable number of them women. Here, formerly, the Rev. J. T. Sunderland was minister, and after him the Rev. J. H. Crooker. The present minister is the Rev. H. Wilder Foote, son of the well-known minister of that name who was formerly, for many years, minister of King's Chapel, in Boston. The importance of a strong ministry in the University towns is fully recognised by the Unitarians of America.

The Michigan State Conference, which was first organised thirty-two years ago, includes not quite twenty Unitarian and other independent churches. Thus the numbers attending the annual gathering were not large, and the meetings have borne a strong resemblance to those of one of our district Associations. Here are just the same problems and very much the same difficulties to face, questions as to the young people, as to the church's attitude towards social reform, as to the relation of religion to practical morals, anxiety over struggling congregations, a sense of the need of strong men, and a better supply of really devoted and efficient ministers. Dr. Hunter preached his well-known sermon: "Guarding the Holy Fire: a Plea for the Culture of the Devout Life," which was felt to be a very opportune word to the Conference; and on Thursday evening (October 3) at the closing meeting, he and the other two International representatives gave addresses, Professor Montet repeating his Boston address on "Calvin and the Reformation." The intervening time was given to the business of the Conference, under the presidency of Mr. C. S. Udell, of Grand Rapids, and to papers and addresses on a large number of subjects. One of the best addresses was given by the Rev. Caroline Bartlett Crane, of Kalamazoo, now retired from her regular ministry in that town, but still active as a preacher. Some of our friends will remember to have seen and heard Miss Caroline Bartlett Crane in England years ago. She made an earnest plea for practical efforts in social service and an appeal to the spirit of self-sacrifice in young people, as that to which they will gladly respond, and as greatly needed for the quickening of religious life in the churches. Several Universalist ministers took part in the Conference, as did also a liberal Congregational and a Baptist minister. Among the members was the Rev. B. van Slyters, of the Holland Unitarian Church, Grand Rapids, of which a brother of the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, of Amsterdam, was formerly minister, until his lamented death. This church is also affiliated with the Dutch Protestantbond.

So we are launched upon fresh interests, and to-morrow go still further West to Chicago, while some sixty of our international comrades are already at sea, in the Saxonia, on the way home, and others in other vessels. The fountain pen which is doing service here, after some further adventures, hopes to sail from New York on the Oceanic, for Southampton, October 23. V. D. D.

THE LOVER OF CONCORD.

THE peacemaker is supposed to be a very blessed person, but the world takes great pains to show him that he is not approved of by her. She is suspicious of the reformer, she regards the poet with indifference, she ignores the prophet; but her implacable hatred is reserved, it seems, for the "mild-eyed lover of concord," who is not imposed upon by her doctrine of force and the mailed fist. Christ was not put to death because he went about doing good, but because he tried to make men love one another,—just as Tolstoy to-day is excommunicated by Holy Church in Russia, and regarded rather dubiously even by those who loyally try to follow the example of their Master, because he has endeavoured to permeate men's minds with the doctrine of universal brotherhood. Wherever one goes, one hears harsh things said about the misguided individuals whose worst crime is that they believe in the innate goodness of the human heart. Society heaps its scorn—though with a great show of good breeding—on people who pin their faith to Hague Conferences, and International Arbitration, instead of clamouring for warships and conscription; and even in the average family circle the "meek of heart" are subjected to the ruthless tyranny of their stronger-minded relatives. "Peace is all very well in its way," says the world, "but you have got to show your enemies that you are not afraid of them. A little parade of power is worth a good deal of conciliation, and the olive branch is more effective when it is held out by a victorious general than when it is borne in the beak of a cooing dove."

Space does not permit one to go into the why and wherefore of all this; and, indeed, enough has been written on the subject already to fill as many goodly volumes as the "Encyclopædia Britannica." Mankind, however, still persists in "stoning the prophets" (though not in quite such a literal manner as was adopted by the slayers of St. Stephen), and it seems idle to spend time in discussing the primitive ferocity which leads the human race to persecute its truest benefactors. One would only like to point out that the peacemaker, paradoxically enough, is the very last person to pretend that the fighting instinct is no longer required, although he thinks it desirable to divert its energy in new directions. Christ himself declared that he came to bring a sword upon the earth, and no one knew better than he did how often his words would put a barrier between hearts linked to each other by the closest ties. If one wishes for examples of inflexible determination, and the warrior-like spirit that never gives in to a foe, one will find them as often among men and women who are ready to spend themselves for a principle as among soldiers who are willing to die for their country. The "meek" have, in fact, always been misunderstood, for they are really as little inclined to grovel at the feet of their adversaries as the most dauntless patriot, and the battle-ground on which their swords are unsheathed has witnessed terrible scenes. The truth is, that if all the nations of the world were to disarm to-morrow, peace would still have to pay the price of pain and conflict for her victories, for there are veritable "powers of darkness" still to be conquered in the human soul long after the last spear has been turned into a pruning-hook. Realising this, the peacemaker urges a cessation of hostilities between man and his brother man, only that each may be the more free to fight the demons of vice and wretchedness that make the coming of the "kingdom of Heaven" seem, very often, such a forlorn and illusory hope.

The true lover of concord knows that the great upward struggle of the race is scarcely more than begun, but he is convinced, also, that the way of progress is not along the path of destruction and bloodshed. Nature, "red in tooth and claw," as the morbid see her, may evince a fearful disregard for life, but humanity can no longer afford to sacrifice its treasures of heart and limb to an insensate passion for power on the part of earthly rulers. If the object were worth it, the peacemaker would not shrink from the spilling of blood, for never can it be said of him that he has shirked either torture or death for the sake of his cause. But it is, after all, that practical common-sense which is the soundest fruit of idealism, that shows him the futility of squandering the bone and sinew of men whom nature has struggled so hard to rear, in order to win for some overgrown empire a few hundred miles of extra territory. And, in the same way, he is learning to realise to what little purpose many fine spirits waste their energy in bitter controversies, trying to thrust on men, in indignant anger, arguments which require to be urged with the patience of a god.

"Let the living live," says the peacemaker, echoing Amiel; "and," he might add, "see to it that their lives are made more tolerable." As for what he himself gains by preaching an unpopular gospel of friendship and reconciliation, he knows that his way will be all the rougher for the smoothness he tries to bring to the paths of others. He does not pander enough to the passions of men to win their appreciation, and when he answers their sneers and taunts quietly, he infuriates them more than if he gave them a blow on the cheek. He shows his brethren that they are nobler than the wild beasts, and they reply that he insults their courage. He goes in and out among the nations, pleading for sane thinking and the appeasement of wrath, and is execrated from the altars dedicated to him whom they call the Prince of Peace. Can one doubt, then, that under his calm smile a very fire is raging, and that his prayer for patience is often wrung from a heart battling with something like despair?

The peacemaker is, indeed, one who would love to hold communion with silence and the stars oftener than his work permits him to do; for the springs of quietness are in his breast, and he is allied to all things that speak of order and serenity. But he, if ever a man was, is a soldier on campaign; and though it is his mission to disarm the nations, he himself must fight on, like any valiant knight of old, to the end. For him there is no rest, no cessation from toil, no relaxing of his energies, no temporising with the "powers that be," until men realise that they are all members of one great family, and allow reason, instead of passion, to take the foremost place in guiding human destinies.

LAURA ACKROYD.

OLD THEOLOGY AND BROAD CHURCH.*

IN Professor Gwatkin's Gifford Lectures we have at once a confession of faith set down by one of our greatest living scholars, and an exemplification of the intellectual temper, at its best, which is traditionally associated with old Cambridge. All that English soberness in spiritual vision (with a somewhat reproachful glance at other zones and climates of thought), all that insistence on the bare fact (to be taken as what it is, its "marble index" uncoloured by romantic heightenings)—it is all here, and agrees well with that spirit of place which incarnated itself in a Clerk Maxwell and a Tait, and described the spiritual world as an "Unseen Universe," whose laws were continuous with those of the seen. Perhaps we shall miss, in such an atmosphere, some of the vital conditions under which the best work of philosophy can be done, and the best illumination given to our religious problems. But philosophy is the only side of Professor Gwatkin's book on which there is any halting or falling short of that fulness and massiveness of great learning which seems to grasp the whole field of scholarship in one survey—with an amenity also that we are accustomed to find only in pictures like Meredith's Dr. Middleton.

The conception of Revelation here unfolded is the one which, thanks to Maurice and his school, is now practically in possession of the field. "Any fact which gives knowledge is a revelation. If particular facts reveal God, they do so only by indicating a certain character; and, though a miracle, if such there were, would be likely to command attention, there is no reason why it should indicate character more than common facts." Therefore, not only what is commonly called religious experience, but also science, philosophy, criticism, culture (the study of beauty) must give their interpretation of the divine. "The vision that floats before me is a vast synthesis of all the experience which the human race has ever had or ever will have had." "Every work which is done on the face of the wide earth for love or duty is as truly communion with God as the Supper of the Lord itself can be, from the Three Hundred in the pass to the child in the slums who gives his last penny to one that needs it more than he does. Here is the secret of the knowledge of God." And it is natural that Professor Gwatkin, holding this beautiful faith, should imagine that he finds it in other thinkers and other ages whose ideas he is concerned to defend. It is but feeble argument, however, which convinces him that the Reformers held his Broad Church view. "There is no reason to think that they ever supposed it (the Bible) to be the only revelation, and, indeed, they could not, without contradicting Scripture itself, which constantly appeals to revelations of God in nature, history, and life. But, if such revelations are real, they must be as much God's word as any that may be given in the particular form of writing. Unless, therefore, some peculiar value be attached to the form of writing, the supremacy of Scripture proclaimed by the English Church fairly resolves itself into the supremacy of revelation howsoever known" (II. 230). This is a clear case of making history retrospectively what you think it ought to have been; and is in fact, corrected in other parts of the book (II. 237). That Professor Gwatkin has abandoned the verbal or even material infallibility of the Bible as a whole (he accepts the main results of Old Testament criticism; as to the New Testament he is much more cautious) cannot alter the history of his Church, or prove that his modernising is a small and unimportant modification of the old system. Indeed, we find that the whole of his position is infected by the initial assumptions which he carries over from the old views, because he is not willing to admit the quite revolutionary nature of some recent, and by him approved, changes in thought, and so he tries to work with old conceptions which are really effete. Take, for example, the way in which he meets the modern reluctance to admit the idea of any revelation at all, whether "natural" or "special." "If God is the ultimate cause of matter, life, and conscience, it is hardly possible to dispute His power to give a revelation, if He so please." We can see the picture—an 18th century picture. Assume one Person—God; and another person—man, and what is there to hinder the one, deemed omnipotent, from "sending the other a message?" (I. 20). It is a stiff, hard anthropomorphism. Professor Gwatkin, it is true, makes much of the 19th century change in doctrine, due to the idea of God's immanence (especially when it seems to support Incarnation theories); but his argument for the possibility of Revelation is based upon an uncriticised view of Transcendence. There is, of course, a lawful place for anthropomorphism in religion; but it becomes a nuisance when it is made the source of irrelevant and mechanical analogies.

It is, in fact, by this very use of it that Professor Gwatkin finds a somewhat easy approach to the idea of miracle. We are to think of God as "so re-arranging physical forces as to bring out new results" (I. 187), just in the same way that we men by exerting our free will guide and deflect nature to new ends. This, according to our author, is, in the case of God's action, Miracle. It is not supernatural but natural, belonging to workings of nature to which we are not accustomed. All nature alike manifests direct divine action, and miracle is not more direct than any other kind of event. The miracles of Jesus, then, fall in with the great probability that a sinless man "must have had power far greater than our own, and been able to do in a perfectly natural way things we cannot do." With him "Love was stronger than death," and the resurrection of Lazarus and of himself illustrates the natural supremacy of the moral over the physical. I do not know whether the turn thus given to the old argument is quite new, but we may be thankful, at least, for the insight which affirms the inward meaning of Christianity to be moral rather than magical. But as an argument for the credibility of miracle stories, or even as a rationale of the miraculous, it suffers from the general weakness already mentioned of all such a priori assumptions as to what God can do or is likely to do. No one doubts that there are great regions of natural fact unknown to science, and great possibilities in the physical universe unrealised in history. Unlike the old supernaturalist, Professor Gwatkin finds the miraculous in the unwonted revelation by God to man of these otherwise unknown regions, and in the unwonted exhibition of these hitherto unrealised possibilities. But, surely, on these principles, an unexpected comet is a miracle, the discovery of radium is a miracle. If not, then the differentiation of a miraculous event lies in the ignorance of the people and the age which observe it, as indeed our author seems to suggest (I. 189). And, apart from the strangeness of the notion that God re-arranges physical forces and natural laws, specially to impress uncultivated races, this theory represents Him as acting upon the world from the outside, and standing to it in the relation of a machinist to a machine which He can make to go slower or faster. From the outside, we say; for the new (miraculous) event would not, according to this theory, have happened in the ordinary evolution of natural fact, but required a special fiat of God's will to produce it. Therefore, a cause external to ordinary natural fact has come into operation. Now, to deal in this way with the conception of God is a perversion of all legitimate method. It completely inverts the natural process of thought by which the idea of God has any reality at all for our minds. "God" is the ultimate interpretation which we are able to put upon our experience as a whole. But (1) ex hypothesi

the experience we at present have of our world does not include the miraculous. We begin (Professor Gwatkin and all) with a world thought of as a whole of experience, that reveals to us God. It is illegitimate, thereupon, to make use of the idea of God so won, to arrive at another world, and a world whose implications are quite different; which is what Professor Gwatkin does. There is no legitimate passage of thought from an orderly world of spiritual Immanence to an erratic world of anthropomorphic Transcendence. We have ex hypothesi exorcised the demon of disorder from our whole of experience, and it will obtain no furtive re-entrance through Professor Gwatkin's new back door. (2) Upon our author's own principles, however extraordinary might be the events which might happen, the modern man would be justified in regarding them as still natural. The question could never arise, therefore, in the form "Could God, or would He, work a miracle?" The question, that is, to have any meaning, would have to be referred to the region of fact in which it was alleged to have taken place; as, e.g., "Would supreme moral excellence give power to raise the dead?"—not a difficult problem, for holiness and physical power do not increase pari passu in our world. In short, questions as to the possibility of miracle and revelation are meaningless. They can only be answered by begging the question, i.e., by first putting into our notion of God all that we intend to prove from it; they can only be asked upon the plane of an unspiritual anthropomorphism.

We are led by Professor Gwatkin's references to Unitarianism to remark, that the same limitations have prevented him from seeing the weakness of the "social" argument for the Trinity (II. 298). The "social element in human nature" no doubt supplied the pattern of much ancient polytheism; and, in fact, it is only when Trinitarianism verges on tritheism, when we take personality hard, that the social doctrine of God gets any countenance. No doubt, the highest human is nearest the divine; but, if we are to personify our human tendencies in this way, there is no end to the fancy pictures our anthropomorphism may project into the life of God. Indeed, when Professor Gwatkin says that Arius "simply did not understand a metaphor," because he refused to interpret "The Son of God" as identifying Christ with Deity, we are tempted to ask whether our author understands a metaphor. Sonship must at any rate imply dependence and obedience. And when a metaphor, as in this case, is almost the only argument for a doctrine, safety lies in taking its analogies low rather than high.

Professor Gwatkin comes much nearer to the really burning questions of our time when he tries to co-ordinate the work of Christ with all other good work in the world. The great leaders of the world's best life are shown to form a "class of mediators," and our author recognises the need there is of re-stating Christ's headship of that organic fellowship through which the world is being saved (I. 219, 241-2)—Mr. Campbell's problem, but he missed it. There is another subject on which we wish Professor Gwatkin allowed to this "organic" view more importance. His severe condemnation of the Roman Church and of the Tractarians is doubtless backed by vast historical knowledge. But when, without, we feel sure, intending to sanction the vulgar rant against Rome, he nevertheless echoes the triviality that it is a "cowardly scepticism" that leads men to "return to the forms of the past," not only are we unmoved, but we find it difficult to be lenient to such mere hardihood of Protestantism. It is simply a sophistication to say it was because they could not find God in the present, that Newman and others returned to the past. They found God in actual history, and history does not mean merely "the past." The world will surely insist upon seeing in history an organic structural expression of the divine. The Tractarians voiced this demand. Mr. Thomas's book has recently suggested a higher way than either the Papist or the schismatical.

Our remarks have had to be controversial, and there is no space to mention the many noble features of these charming lectures; the fine flower of the evangelical piety; the strong, prophet-like approval of the socialistic drift of present-day politics; the moral trumpet-note warning a rich and careless England that it has a soul to lose.

W. WHITAKER.

A LOVER OF NATURE.

A DELIGHTFULLY bound, printed and papered volume reaches us from the hand of a true nature-lover, "The Days of a Year,"* a "nature diary," somewhat original in conception. The plan of the diary has been to furnish a sketch or description of something from nature, something seen, each day of a whole year—the authoress's intimacy and observation. It is the diary of a mind in communion with but one object (so far as we are admitted into confidence), the world of natural beauty, as seen by a lover of beauty, whose eyes are sophisticated or exploited of their vision by the double purpose of beholding and of making a book. Sensitive lover and worshipper as the diarist is, she is not quite disinterested in her worship. The literary instinct is insistent with her, and takes toll of her religion. In her privatest moments she has had ever a thought of the public.

The diarist is in control of a musical style, and a very sympathetic and pliant vocabulary. She loves the sounds of words and their suggestions of beauty, association, and colour. If her pictures are not sufficiently passionate or self-forgetful to interest us powerfully in themselves they succeed in interesting us in the painter. Here is character, sensibility, and faculty, the indication of a personality which will grow to something unusually good and fine when its affections have bestowed their leisure upon a task more serviceable.

We quote the following as an illustration of the diarist's delicacy:—"The tasselled beech-nut bloom floats lightly to the grass in the tree's deep shade." Her music and much more are noticeable in the description of an elder tree:—"It stands, this blossoming and queenly beauty, in a little dusty yard . . . flowering as splendidly as if the centre of a masque of Summer, and giving its sweetness to the roaming winds."

* "The Days of a Year." By M. D. Ashley Dodd. (London: Elkin Matthews. 2s. 6d. net.)

August 22 is thus marked in the diary:—
" . . . The sweet sound of running water makes a murmurous poem of cool and quiet things, the earth-smell rises, and the ferns hold their fairy-pointed fronds as if listening to wonderful secrets." We admire the book, but we should have preferred the ferns to behave like ferns. Elsewhere the diarist compares a butterfly to some "enfranchised and divinely happy spirit—seeking other and more ethereal worlds." But the most delightful butterflies remain as butterflies, and deepen our happiness in the present world.

To say of elm trees "they lean to the ground and they look to the sky, and so, in shielding love and Divine aspiration, belong to earth and heaven," is a profitless and laborious sentimentalism; and pansies "with leaves held out like hands in thanksgiving" are humbugs all of them. The diarist slips often into the error of comparing interesting things with uninteresting:—"The wet sweet briar is like some Divine dream memory, the lilac odour like thoughts of heaven, and the long golden chains of the dripping laburnum flowers like treasures from paradise."

It is a pleasure to read of the kingfisher "as it passes swiftly over the silver moat full of floating lilies, and disappears into the green mystery of gold-green poplars and their shivering reflections," although such graceful dallying cannot detain us long. The accompanying reflection:—"Vision that leaves behind a feeling of enchantment, almost too bright for everyday earth life," suggests to us that our authoress has yet to live the "earth-life." In our belief, her fancies and fond forlorn yearnings fail to satisfy herself, persistently as she has sustained them. Yet she has given us pleasure by contact with her spirit, and we would incite affections so endeavouring and powers that crave for useful exercise to mingle themselves with the world of men and women, with the suffering and the toil, and the upward striving of humanity. One disinterested act of the will or the intellect is worth a world of graceful sentiment, and our diarist's love for beauty will aid her to rightly directed purposes in a field which needs every earnest labourer.

MASTER of music, whom immortal love
Gave the deep wisdom of melodious truth;
Child of pure harmony, full fraught with skill;

Heir to a treasure of the heart of worlds
Hidden from travellers whose tired eyes
Gaze on mere surfaces, or search in mines
Tricks of vain riches, glitters of the dust;
Thou hast well served, thy art was of a man
More than musician, more than interpreter;

Thy greatness touched us, patient, kind,
reserved,

And in beholding thee we knew our strength
Flowing from regions where thou livest

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE MAN WITH TEN THOUSAND YARDS OF GREEN CLOTH.

THERE once lived a man who had ten thousand yards of green cloth, and it was his peculiar delight to spread this out on the ground and look at it. Truly it was a quaint and pretty show, for the material was cleverly wrought with many different patterns, and while, as I have said, it was to be generally described as green cloth, this in itself would give but a poor idea of the variety of shades which it included. Here the weaver had introduced a shuttle of crimson thread, there of gold, and now of brown and other colours, giving the impression of what is commonly called a heather-mixture by the tailors and hosiers. For many yards a pretty effect was produced by the insertion of a white thread which caused the emerald background to be sprinkled as it were with bright specks. A very handsome piece was wrought with thick raised threads of darker hue, which produced a noble, velvet surface. This, were it sufficiently magnified, might fairly have stood for a diminutive forest, where oaks and beeches grew and pines enriched the texture with their more sombre foliage. Here and there the pattern was enlivened by the forms of animals and birds; but though I examined some hundreds of yards of the cloth at times when it was spread out to view, there did not appear to be much variety in the designs of this nature. Foxes' tails were worked into the pattern in grotesque fashion, and of pheasants and partridges there was no lack. Truly these are birds of gay feather, especially the cock birds of the former species, and they looked comely enough on the cloth. But there were thousands of yards of this design, for which the owner seemed to have a childish preference. For my own part, the incessant repetition of this same design became somewhat wearisome. My feelings were the same, and so too, was evidently his fancy, with regard to a rabbit design, in which innumerable rabbits, large and small, were portrayed in every conceivable attitude—some were sitting on their haunches with ears erect as though listening against danger; others as with their noses on the ground nibbling the clover; many were rushing helter-skelter to their burrows with their white tail-signal up, as though for dear life; and many more were turning head over heels in the air. When I first caught sight of this comic picture I laughed heartily, as anyone might, but an acquaintance of the owner of the cloth having one day explained to me the reason why this design was inscribed, my feeling of pleasure abated. For, so my informant assured me, the owner had this piece woven to his own idea, because nothing pleased him better than the antics of a rabbit when 'twas shot by the sportsman. This was what I had seen. Beside these patterns there were others of scarlet-coated huntsmen, following the hounds, and of dogs giving chase to hares. For this last I had no stomach. It was to me a picture of nothing but fear and pain, and while I must own to the vividness of the design of the hunt, and the skill with which it was wrought into the fabric, I should have preferred to imagine that the pack were on the scent of a red-herring. But enough of the pattern. Considering the almost unlimited resources of the looms in these days, it struck me that upon such a vast quantity of cloth a more varied art might have been brought into play. In place of some of those bales of rabbit and pheasant cloth, I should have liked to see more flower designs, especially some suggested by wall-flowers and hollyhocks and other frequenters of cottage gardens. Also I thought sundry patterns, in which hay-making and harvesting scenes played a part, would not be out of place.

You may be thinking, from what I have said, that anyone was at liberty to examine this interesting cloth. If so, you are mistaken. So far from extending a welcome to observers of his property the owner put many obstacles in the way, and even employed his servants to keep people at a distance. Now and again he would admit the public, otherwise one had to satisfy curiosity by guide.

You will want to know the purpose for which all this store of valuable cloth was laid up. I am sorry I cannot satisfy your desire. I have never been able to satisfy my own mind on this point. It is certain that the man could never use it up for his own clothing, even if he had lived as long as Methuselah. Besides, he was not averse to increasing his store whenever he saw a roll of stuff which took his fancy. In this way, his wealth in green cloth was ever growing larger. Meanwhile many of his neighbours were in serious want of clothing, and would have been grateful had they been allowed to purchase but a few yards apiece. But say what they might of their need and this wealth, they could never convince the man of the reasonableness of their request; not even when in a crowd they hung round his fence on a cold day with scarce enough upon their backs to cover them. The man said that it would be a pity to cut into the cloth; it would spoil the look of it. Green cloth, he protested, was not made for the public to wear. Besides, most of this was very ancient, being handed down to him from his ancestors, and he could not dream of cutting up such a sacred inheritance.

And so the ten thousand yards of green cloth remained to amuse the fancy of their owner by the quaint and beautiful designs upon it, but serving no other purpose for which cloth is made.

And that cloth is really the surface of the earth which certain rich men selfishly withhold from the use of those who need it.

WHEN once it is revealed to us that righteousness is to be sought where the Heart-searcher seeks it, not in the material thing done, but in the spiritual spring from which it issues, we discover that it may indeed be infinite, and stretch in advance of a progressive nature, as the object of eternal aspiration.—James Martineau.

It is true that love cannot be forced, that it cannot be made to order, that we cannot love because we ought or even because we want. But we can bring ourselves into the presence of the lovable. We can enter into friendship through the door of discipleship. We can learn love through service.—Hugh Black.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIALISM.

THE Archdeacon of Ely, in a paper read before the Church Congress on Christianity and Economic Problems, made some rather daring statements. "Christianity has nothing whatever to do with modern Social Ideals as I understand the term; all attempts to reconstruct our economic life on some new basis, to re-apportion wealth more equally between the rich and poor, to rouse public opinion to the evil of gigantic trusts, and of allowing the means of production to be engrossed in private hands lie outside the commission of the Church; she had better let them severely alone and do her proper work as earnestly as she can. . . . So long as social changes are regarded as expedients, and are discussed pro and con. on grounds of expediency, we are on perfectly firm ground, just because the progress of Socialism is being treated in its economic aspects, and not as an ethical system. When Socialism assumes this latter character, the difficulty begins; its projects are not criticised from the point of view of expediency, but held up as ideals and invested with a sort of glamour. Our Christian belief is that life develops from within, that it is by spiritual influence in the heart that good may be attained in the outward sphere." These words remind us of a sermon by F. W. ROBERTSON on "Man, who made me a judge and a divider over you?" "It was no part of CHRIST's work to take from the oppressor and give to the oppressed, much less to encourage the oppressed to take from the oppressor himself. He asserted principles of love, unselfishness, order, which would decide all questions, but the questions themselves he would not decide. Christianity commits itself to nothing except eternal principles. That the oppressor should become generous and the covetous liberal were a great gain; but to take from one selfish brother in order to give to another selfish brother, what spiritual gain would there have been in this? CHRIST triumphs by wrongs meekly borne even more than by wrongs legally righted." Whatever ROBERTSON says must be received with respect, and with the feeling that there is probably considerable truth in it. But we cannot help remembering that JESUS was by no means meek towards Scribes and Pharisees who laid heavy burdens on men's backs and refused to touch them with the tips of their fingers, and that he was by no means meek towards the money-changers in the Temple who profaned his Father's house. It is one thing to bear our own wrongs meekly and quite another to bear the wrongs of the helpless and the oppressed.

We believe that words like the Archdeacon's will rouse a great deal of bitterness amongst many who are whole-heartedly devoting themselves to the good of humanity, and that, on the other hand, they will meet with a great deal of approval from a comfortable section of the community who wish to grow rich in their own way. They have no objection whatever to the Churches talking about Love and Goodness as much as they like, so long as they leave business methods and particular wrongs alone. LOWELL expresses the sentiments of these people in the Biglow Papers when he says:

"I'm willin' a man should go tollable strong Agin wrong in the abstract, for that kind of wrong
Is allus unpop'lar, and never gits pitied, Because it's a crime no one ever committed.
But he must not be hard on partickler sins,
Coz then he'll be kickin' the people's own shins."

We do not, however, quote the Archdeacon's words in order to attack him or to add to the misunderstandings and mutual recriminations which take place between those who hold his position and the many earnest, self-sacrificing men and women who are identifying Christianity with Socialism. It is greatly to be desired that Christian Individualists and Christian Socialists, however divided intellectually, should not feel themselves necessarily antagonistic morally and religiously.

We have heard a good deal lately of charges against Socialists that they are atheistical. That is, of course, pure nonsense. No doubt there are Atheists and Agnostics among them, as there are among Individualists, but there is no connection either in theory or in practice between Atheism and Socialism.

Our own fear is the very reverse of this: it is the fear that Socialists are claiming to be the only religious people in the community, the only people who really understand the spirit of CHRIST and who treat all men as brothers. Against this absolute identification of Socialism and Christianity—an identification which so powerful and popular a preacher as Mr. CAMPBELL seems to favour—the protest of the Archdeacon appears to us justifiable. It is worth realising that, while there is this silly talk in some quarters about the immorality and irreligion of Socialists, there is growing up among Socialists themselves a strong conviction that no one can be truly religious or a follower of CHRIST unless he is a Socialist. The Christian Churches will find this charge of Atheism thrown back upon themselves with much more passion, and perhaps more reason, than the similar charge made against Socialists. With more reason, we say, because wherever you find a genuine Socialist you find a man with some high ideals, whereas in a genuine Individualist you may only find a man with some fixed principles. The man with high ideals and with a passionate belief in and devotion to them is more religious than the man of fixed principles, while the latter, on the other hand, is probably the more moral of the two.

The deeper spiritual consciousness of Christendom has long been trying to free the Gospel of CHRIST from identification with particular theological doctrines. It has maintained that the Gospel of CHRIST is not to be labelled Trinitarianism or Unitarianism, and identified with one theory to the exclusion of the other. Trinitarian or Unitarian doctrines are forms through which the Gospel may be expressed; one form may be more adequate or less adequate than another, but Christianity is a spirit which may be found present in doctrines very far removed from what we think the truth.

Christianity emerging from bondage to doctrines, and from the claims of sectarian bigots to its sole possession, is now in danger of being identified with theories and ideals of society. Socialists are claiming with growing insistence that they are the only real Christians in the community. We willingly and gladly recognise the true Socialist as a genuine Christian, devoted to the good of the community and ready to sacrifice himself for others in the spirit of JESUS. But we do venture to claim that the respectable middle-class capitalist, believing in quite other social ideals and social methods, may be a genuine Christian too. He may be, and often is, honest to his own hurt, devoted to the cause of education, eager to encourage and sympathise with the young and to train them into a manly independence. He may have high ideals of truth and freedom, to which he is willing to sacrifice his own ease or safety.

The Gospel of JESUS CHRIST must not be identified with any social theories, however beautiful, or any social methods, however good they may seem to us. We cannot think the Archdeacon right in bidding the Church to leave social evils severely alone, but we think he is justified in claiming that the Gospel of CHRIST shall not be identified with particular ways of dealing with particular ills, and in recalling our attention to the fundamental truth that "life develops from within, and that it is by spiritual influences in the heart that good may be attained in the outward sphere."

UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY AND THE NEW THEOLOGY.

Now that the flutter over the Rev. R. J. Campbell's heresy has subsided, the time is come when the relation between the New Theology and Unitarian Christianity may profitably be considered, and we cordially welcome the little book in which the Rev. J. Worsley Austin, M.A., has done this. Mr. Campbell and his friends are emphatic in their wish that their Theology shall not be labelled Unitarianism. Very well, we, too, have no wish to insist on giving it a name which we know has often proved misleading. But Mr. Austin writes clearly and strongly, and not a whit too strongly, to show that the New Theology has crossed the great dividing line. There is a conception of Christianity which is perfectly well understood and has been accepted as orthodox for centuries, and the New Theology answers the question, Is this true? in the negative. It represents the Incarnation as something which is now partly realised, and is destined to be completely realised, in us, the human race, Christ being the supreme representative. The Church doctrine, as Bishop Gore states with equal emphasis, is something entirely different; this regards the Incarnation as a unique act of creation. The Virgin birth, a definite act in place and time, places an impassable gulf between Christ and ourselves. Mr. Campbell maintains that the old controversy between Trinitarianism and Unitarianism vanishes. Mr. Austin shows that this is the case only after a complete surrender of all that is vital to Trinitarianism. Mr. Campbell thinks that the battle for the New Theology is practically won. Mr. Austin has some wise words deprecating over-confidence, and pleading for more union in the liberal ranks.

In a second chapter Mr. Austin asks what is the essence of Unitarianism, and finds it in the right of a free search for Truth, absolutely unlimited. It would be more correct to acknowledge that this free search is limited by the bounds of religion. Churches built for the worship of God cannot be turned into secularist lecture halls without a breach of trust. In the same way, a university chair founded for the study and teaching of geology could not be devoted to the advancement of something that is not geology, say Christian Science, without a similar breach of trust, and we accept such limitation without regarding it as in the least infringing the full liberty of the geological professor. What Mr. Austin says about the width and depth of Religion, as distinguished from the various historical religions, is admirably put, as is also his assertion that when the impulse of true religion is felt, its claim for liberty is known to be the assertion of the right of an open way to God. The New Theology, he declares, has found a living God and has faith in liberty, which it shows by claiming freedom to examine the great credentials of popular Christianity, the words of the Bible and of Christ.

Christianity itself Mr. Austin defines as a movement. In the course of this movement something is being evolved, and this something, he maintains, is not a system of dogma, not an ecclesiastical institution, and not a scheme of salvation. It is the personal influence of a man. This is well put, though Mr. Austin rather weakens his position by going on to rank Jesus as one of the world's prophets. He was that and something more, and what that something more is we often express by saying that we value some friend not so much for what he says as for what he is. The deepest truth in this matter is expressed by Dr. Martineau in the prayer containing the sentence, "O God, who didst send thy word to speak in the prophets and live in thy Son." This thought of a divine word living in the life as well as speaking in the sayings of Jesus is exactly what is needed for the modern doctrine of the Incarnation.

With regard to what Unitarians believe about human nature, Mr. Austin finds a central, determining thought in its essential unity. "The divisions between men are as nothing in comparison with the fundamental facts which unite them." Mankind is a genus which has no species, only varieties. This is fatal to all caste, privilege, and exclusiveness. Good, but it would have strengthened the argument to have pointed out that this applies still more strongly to souls than to human bodies. All minds, said Channing, are of one family, and if the fatherhood of God is something more than a metaphor, if it states a plain fact, this fact must be a fact of spirit not of matter. Now it is a fact of spirit with which Mr. Austin deals when he goes on to the two sharp divisions which ran a horrible dividing line through the midst of humanity—the Calvinist distinction between the elect and the non-elect, and the Catholic distinction between the baptized and the un-baptized. At the present day we can have faith in humanity itself and feel that the best in each comes out of that which is common to all, and this is getting back to the grand universalism of Christ which has been so grievously overlaid during centuries of misunderstanding. Yet there is a foundation for the two-fold distinction which religious teachers have seldom failed to draw, and which is certainly not absent from the teaching of Christ. Martineau has expounded it with his unique insight and force, and Mr. Austin would find it a good supplement to his own statement of the case, for we most thoroughly destroy an error when we can explain it. It is the distinction between doing right and doing wrong, between faithfulness and unfaithfulness, obedience and disobedience. It divides men not according to the kind of temptation to which they are exposed, but solely according as they resist or yield to their own temptations.

Mr. Austin easily answers the question, What takes the place of the Fall? by saying, in effect, The Rise, the scientific teaching of a progressive evolution with a brute inheritance out of which we are gradually growing. This belief is in full harmony with the faith that God is no mere outside power, giving us commands, but is the higher power which has entered into human nature and is there the upward impelling force. Sin, therefore, is unfaithfulness to the highest law of a man's own being, not merely disobedience to an arbitrary command, and by clearly expounding this truth Mr. Austin avoids what has been very generally regarded as the weakest point in Mr. Campbell's exposition of his theology. With regard to salvation, Mr. Austin frankly admits that for it, Unitarians have no specific. He says some men have been saved by the preaching of hell fire, but not all are so influenced; and some others, but not all, by preaching faith in the Atonement; and he thinks that in the same way some men would be saved by a change from the slums of Birmingham to a healthy environment in Canada. But there is a difference here which he has failed to notice owing to his disregard of the real two-fold distinction. Mere change of environment will change the class of temptation but not the habit of yielding to or resisting temptation. The man who yielded to one kind of temptation in Birmingham would yield to another class of temptation in Canada, if nothing more was done for him; and the reason why emigration, especially for children, often is so efficient for good, is that more is done through the power of love and trust. With all that is said here concerning the power of these redeeming forces we are in fullest accord, and if there is any advantage in speaking of specific agents for salvation, we have them here.

Mr. Austin's last chapter on Eternal Life is more of an introduction to the subject than an adequate treatment of it. He says well that living for eternal life is living for eternal things in this life, and points out much that may predispose men to accept the belief in immortality. But for the great arguments such as have been given us by Channing, Martineau, or J. E. Carpenter, we shall here look in vain. Some indication of them we should have been glad to see, and we hope that Mr. Austin will sometime give us a fuller exposition of the Gospel which he can preach so well. H. S. S.

CONIGRE CHAPEL, TROWBRIDGE.

JUBILEE CELEBRATION.

THE jubilee of the opening of Conigre Chapel in 1857 was celebrated on Sunday, October 6, 1907, when a memorial brass to the Rev. S. Martin, who was mainly instrumental in raising the funds for the building, was unveiled by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., of Lewin's Mead, Bristol.

The services commenced with a prayer-meeting at eight o'clock in the morning, which was well attended. Communion service followed at 10.30 and the regular service at 11 o'clock. These were conducted by the pastor, Rev. J. Wain, who at the latter service delivered an appropriate sermon from the words Mark iv. 14, "The sower soweth the word."

In the evening the chapel was crowded. The preacher was the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., of Bristol, who has been the pastor at Lewin's Mead chapel for upwards of 40 years. In very well-chosen and sympathetic terms he unveiled the Samuel Martin memorial brass, which bore the following inscription:—

"Dedicated to the memory of the Rev. Samuel Martin, as a record of his unselfish zeal in securing, by much arduous labour, the greater part of the money by which this church was erected. It was opened on October 1, 1857, and 50 years after this Tablet was placed here by a congregation who continue to hold him in reverence."

After the usual devotional exercises, Mr. Blatchford took for his text, Deut. iv. 32, "Ask now of the days that are past." Most aptly and truly, he said, do these words express your reverent and grateful thoughts as you gather in your beloved house of prayer this night. A commemoration more than usually noteworthy claims your recollection. For, think of all that you can call to mind. Fifty years of faithful and continuous testimony for doctrines and principles which have satisfied the souls of generation after generation. Fifty years of deep, serious, but ever unpretentious religious life, which has been fed and quickened by that trust, and prayer and praise, which have surely made your treasured old Conigre a holy place indeed to you, and nothing less than the house of God and the gate of heaven. And you call to mind other things than these. Ask again of the fifty years gone by since this loved church of yours first enriched with its new beauties the old and cherished faith of its forerunner, and then see how tender, how sacred, how comforting are those personal recollections, which are to me the holiest legacies of bygone faith and life. I know, friends, that in the honoured life of your religious community here, the long flight even of fifty years is but a fragment. We do not forget that the years of its continuous testimony can be reckoned by centuries. And pleasant and very profitable it would be to dwell upon the records of faithfulness in times so distant from our own. But you have called me here for a definite and for an equally sacred purpose. We are to rejoice together in the glad memories of the fifty years of this beautiful church's life, and in the sweet and happy recollection of that beloved old "servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ," Samuel Martin, to whom the erection of this fair house of prayer was so very, very largely due. This house of prayer was built not in contentious antagonism to the faith of the good and true of other and of different religious communities, but as a religious house for themselves, a house with its door thrown open wide to any who might seek sympathy with the thoughts and customs of those who faithfully and consistently worshipped here. Those who reared this building did but seek to worship God, as only they could worship Him in their own way, and, therefore, "in spirit and in truth." That was the deep feeling of the founders of this church, as I read it, and I believe and am sure the self-same spirit animates both people and pastor here this day. But how good and pleasant it is to turn to the records of the time and to find from them that the spirit of the builders was such as I have indicated. Listen to the words of the narrator of the experiences of that day, Thursday, October 1, 1857, when this church of yours was first opened for divine service. "It is gratifying to state," the writer says, "that persons of every religious denomination in the town have aided the congregation in the erection of their new place of worship. One lady, a member of the Established Church, contributed £25, and several other orthodox friends have also given most liberally." Such is the adequate and delightful evidence of the spirit in which your predecessors built this church, and of the kindly and ready appreciation which that spirit met with from the worshippers in other temples round about them. You remember well how it came to pass that Nehemiah and his faithful ones rebuilt the walls of Zion. It was from the simple reason that "the people had a mind to work." And I "speak that which I do know" when I say that if ever a congregation, from its beloved minister to its humblest member, was animated to work, in the truest spirit of self-devotion, it was, in very deed, this congregation of the Conigre. Oh, you know, my friends, and you proudly remember how Samuel Martin went forth to gather aid from kindred spirits up and down the land, and what a splendid measure of success crowned his untiring and self-forgetting efforts. No wonder that those who loved and followed him were moved to emulate his loving services. And so it came about that Mr. William Smith, architect and builder here in Trowbridge, generously made the drawings and superintended the erection of the building; and to their honour and in grateful remembrance of them, let us recollect how two steadfast and sincere souls, John and Jacob Taylor, the master-masons, freely gave the greater portion of the beautiful ornamental stonework that adorns this temple in which you worship. And as it was with the chiefs so was it with the people, the same spirit of earnestness and of thoroughness in the work before them was seen in all. From your beloved old pastor's own lips I heard, how, in his association with the smallest details of the work, which was such a joy to him, he one day, in a darkened corner of the fabric, found a young man labouring by the light of a candle, to set a polish upon the head of a metal bolt, and then as the old minister marvelled at the toil upon an object that few or none might look upon afterwards, the young workman glanced up into the kindly face and said, "Oh, Father Martin, didn't you say to us last Sunday that God's eye was in all places?" Can we wonder that a blessing followed such heart-whole service from one and all? Well might they sing their hymn of thanksgiving on that October day half a century ago, And what a worthy company of his brethren in the ministry gathered round the pastor and his people in the happy moment of their finished task. Worthily did our beloved old friend, the Rev. William James, of Bristol, preach the dedication sermon from those most fitting words from Ezra, "We are the servants of the God of heaven and earth, and build the house that was builded many years ago." Present, too, was that true and cherished friend of all who knew him, the Rev. William James Odgers, of Bath, the venerable Henry Howse, Edwin Chapman, John Lettis Short, and Philip Pearsall Carpenter, all trusted standard-bearers in our churches; and side by side there stood Jerom Murch and Charles Moore and Thomas Jolly, John Leeves, James May

Shattock, and our own honoured friend, Herbert Thomas, of Bristol. And when the services of thanksgiving were continued on the following Sabbath, Henry Solly and Joseph Calrow Means added their "word in season" to the delight of all who heard them. I thank God there are survivors of that good time amongst you still; in their presence, and of their faithful testimony, I must pray them to realise the thoughts it would be unbecoming in me to speak. But you will not wonder if I carry in my heart enshrined amongst my happiest memories of beloved fathers and forerunners in the work of the ministry the recollections at once so happy, and so vivid still, of him whose name and whose lovable spirit are so closely and so lastingly entwined with every holy and dear association of the Conigre. Friends, what can I tell you of Samuel Martin, of which you who worship here are not already fully and rightly cognisant? You will believe how soft and sweet a touch there came upon my own spirit from one whose life was so innocent, so brightly happy, and yet so deeply devout, and so suffused with reverence for God, and for every good word, and deed, and thought. I call to mind his implicit, his unlimited trust, and belief in his fellow-men. I do not believe that in his transparent purity of life and thought he could form an unworthy or an unkind estimate of a single soul. And you know it was just that simplicity and sincerity on his part that armed his loving and persuasive appeals for righteousness, for pity, for every Christian grace, with their real power. And I remember also what lovely capabilities were locked within that warm and earnest heart of his. You and I have heard him from this pulpit; but I have listened to him elsewhere, and before a vastly different audience. Even yet I can call to mind the magic spell with which he held a gathering in a London Music Hall that listened and thrilled and wept as our dear "Father Martin" told them the fadeless story of the Prodigal Son. I tell you of a truth "his word was with power," and well would it be if all of us were permitted so to touch and soften the souls among whom our duty may call us. I remember, too, the terms of real personal friendship and brotherly communion in which he invariably lived and worked with the ministers of every church around him. With the clergyman and the Nonconformist pastor he was as a brother beloved, serving heart and soul with them in every good cause whenever and wherever possible, and well do I call to mind the keen delight with which he showed me a biretta, which, in true brotherly friendship, he had received as a gift from a kind-hearted priest of the Roman Catholic Church. What he was to you, among the young, by the bedside of the sufferer, and by the open sepulchre, your hearts will give a sacred answer when you ask them of "the days that are past." So for fifty years he went in and out among you, alike loving and beloved. And then the quiet shadows lengthened before him, and one of the last affectionate services that William James rejoiced to offer to a friend was rendered to your dear old friend and his when my honoured old predecessor at Lewin's Mead was permitted to gather, and to present to Samuel Martin that testimonial which so many up and down the land rejoiced to offer as a tribute to Mr. Martin's self-denying life and work and a sign of their widespread and hearty appreciation thereof. And then, at last, the parting came, and the faithful soul left as his best legacy to this church he so dearly loved the impress of his own beautiful and religious spirit. Out of our memory of the past I pray you believe, my friends, there comes a message also. The message is, God abides, duty abides, the remembrance of that sweet life that shines forth from the hill in Galilee remains the same yet, every generation is alike the servant of the living God, and our true and worthy remembrance of the saints that have been must speak in our faithfulness to God and to our fellow-men, and bear fruit in the better lives and nobler faith of ages yet to come.

Collections were taken on behalf of Chapel Funds. Vegetables and fruit were delivered among the poor of the district and congregation.

LIFE OF ELIZABETH P. CHANNING.

SIR.—The American Unitarian Association has just published the "Autobiography and Diary" of Elizabeth P. Channing. I have seen no notice of the book in any English paper, and perhaps some of your readers may not have had their attention directed to its significance. Miss Channing was a woman of the highest intellectual capacity and the deepest and most refined spiritual perceptions, keen but tender, humorous though of most serious purpose, versatile and open-minded, yet faithful at every trial of mind or heart to the light of the eternal truth. Struggling with her own intellectual doubts through many a slow conflict, these touching records, now given to us in this diary, can hardly fail to charm, to elevate, and to encourage.

Dr. Martineau said of her "Kindling Thoughts"—"It reminded me of Amiel's Journal Intime, with this characteristic difference, that while his reflections end, as they begin, with thought pure and simple, yours issue in some rule of practice. His exhibit and keep the spiritual life in suspense; yours impel it to realised character and action." This was not only true of her literary work, but emphatically so of her whole life. One need hardly hope for more, than that the Diary now published may extend and perpetuate the ennobling influence so long exerted by her courageous words and moving presence.

FREDERICK BLOUNT MOTT.

THE Government has concluded negotiations for the purchase of the estate of Interliever, on Loch Awe, for the purpose of establishing a Scottish State Forest. The estate consists of over 12,000 acres of rough pasture, and the price appears to have been fixed at about 50s. an acre. It is intended to plant it, and to establish a school of forestry upon it.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Boston, U.S.A.

We are asked to insert the following Address of Greeting from the British Ministerial Fellowship to the Unitarian Ministers of America and Canada. It was presented at the Ministers' Meeting held in Boston on September 30, by Rev. Charles Roper, President of the Fellowship.

"The Members of the Ministerial Fellowship (of Great Britain and Ireland) send sincere and brotherly greetings to their ministerial brethren of the Unitarian Churches of the United States and Canada, on the occasion of the International Congress at Boston, September, 1907. We recognise the interest and importance of this Fourth Meeting organised by the International Council of Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers. A number of our fellow-members are crossing the Atlantic, personally to grip your hands and to feel the thrill and inspiration of your strenuous life; while those who are left behind will be with you in the spirit as fraternal co-workers in the same great field of labour. We gratefully acknowledge our indebtedness to the leaders of thought among you, for the freshness and vigour of their presentations of religious truth. So strong and so many are the ties that bind us together, that notwithstanding the stretch of ocean between, we feel we are indeed One Household of Faith, with a common gospel and a common literature. Your prophets are our prophets, and we rejoice to think that our prophets are also yours. We want you to feel that you have our strong and hearty sympathy in the noble work in which you and your churches are engaged. In many ways your greater achievements inspire and encourage us. We proudly feel that our sympathy with you is reciprocated, and that we together recognise that we are serving in the same holy cause, searching for the same truth in the same fearless way, and looking up to the same God for light and strength and guidance in our common endeavours. The Ministerial Fellowship is an elective body, which was founded in 1899, and now numbers 152 members, every year adding considerably to its roll. By their subscriptions its members are insured for benefit between pastorates, a system we have found most serviceable in many cases, and which we cordially commend to your consideration. You may perhaps profit from our experience in this direction, as we, in our Settlements Bureau and projected Supply Bureau, are trying to learn from yours. We are convinced that in the close co-operation of brother ministers much good may be done for themselves and for the churches which they represent. Brethren, all hail! The contingent that invade your shores come in the glad spirit of peace and brotherly love. We know how heartily you will welcome them as our representatives. We earnestly pray that, in the future, as in the past, we may on both sides of the Atlantic work for the realisation of universal peace and acknowledged brotherhood the wide world over, until men everywhere have beaten their swords into plough-shares and their spears into pruning-hooks. God speed the time when men's energies are wholly devoted to discovering His newer and wider truth, and bringing nearer that glorious kingdom of God for which so many generations of faithful men and women have laboured with unflagging zeal and undaunted hope. We are, in all sincerity, and on behalf of our whole Fellowship, yours fraternally, Charles Roper (president), Dendy Agate (treasurer), J. Crowther Hirst (Settlement secretary), Christopher J. Street (secretary of the Fellowship). June 3, 1907."

The Boston ministers' meeting responded in the following resolution:—

"That we extend a vote of thanks to the Rev. F. C. Fleischer, the Rev. Valentine D. Davis, and the Rev. Charles Roper for their kindness in addressing us; that we hereby express our profound appreciation of their presence among us and the inspiring words they have brought us; that we ask them to bear our fraternal greetings to the English Ministerial Fellowship and all of our fellow labourers for the great cause of liberal religion in the several lands which they represent, in the spirit which clasps hands across the seas and belts the earth with bonds of sympathetic fellowship." Adopted by unanimous vote of the Ministerial Union.

Atherton.—Chowbent Chapel, "after" very considerable and necessary internal renovations, was re-opened on Sunday, the special services being conducted by Rev. Joseph Wood (Birmingham), and Rev. J. J. Wright, resident minister. At the evening service the spacious old chapel was very crowded, and great satisfaction was expressed concerning the improvements, including the electric lighting. The collections, including a surprise contribution from the young people, amounted to £44. Six weeks previously at the school sermons there had already been given over £56.

Billingshurst.—On Sunday, October 6, at the Free Christian (General Baptist) Church, the harvest thanksgiving services were preached by the Rev. George Lansdowne to good congregations. On Monday evening a service was conducted by the Rev. C. Ginever, of Dover, who took his text from Psalm cxlii: "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it." He commenced by referring to a visit he had paid to one of the beautiful buildings of Venice, and to the reply of the priest when he expressed his wonder at the skill of the builders. "Ah! sir," he said, "it was the Holy Spirit that was in them." The church here was built as an expression of reverential feeling, and only as that feeling remained could the work of the church prosper. As with our human bodies, when the activity of life ceased to renew fibre and tissue, then death commenced. What sustained a church was what its members could give to it—not money only, or principally, but loving service. He told the story of the emperor who erected a grand church, and over the portals inscribed his name as its founder, but in the morning found that of "Euphrasia" was substituted for it; when this occurred a second time, and inquiries were made, it was found that Euphrasia was a poor widow, who from her scanty straw palliase had abstracted its stuffing that the horses' feet might not slip in drawing their heavy burdens up the hill. When Kepler, the astronomer, found his students poring over books, he tried to send them direct to Nature herself, with a heart full of love for her and her ways, so they would gain insight and knowledge of them. He instanced the case of a member of his congregation, whose life was one long giving; yet, of all the members, she was most blest by its services. If people did not respond to our endeavours for their good, was it not worth while to ask if we had been too self-centred, if the fault was not in some measure our own? Socrates influenced the wild youths of Athens by his love for and sympathy with them, and the unique part played in the history of the world by Christ himself was due to his overflowing measure of that same spirit. Might God bless the little church whose anniversary they kept to-day, and grant that the work it will do in the future may be more and even better than it had been in the past. Before the service a bountiful tea had been provided in the school-room, of which members and visitors (principally from Horsham) partook. After it a short public meeting was held, in which the Revs. J. J. Marten, C. Ginever, G. Lansdowne, Mr. Tarring, and Mr. William Carter took part. The autumn flowers and foliage were most tastefully arranged, and many of the visitors went home laden with spoils.

Bolton.—Harvest services were held on Sunday, Oct. 13. The services were conducted in the morning by the Rev. Felix Holt, B.A., and in the afternoon and evening by the Rev. J. M. Bass, M.A. At the afternoon service the members of the Bentley Quartet rendered a most excellent programme of music, and in the evening the choir sang the anthem, "Fear not, O Land." The church was tastefully decorated with flowers and fruit, and the collections realised £8 10s. 6d.

Dover.—The hospital collections were taken at Adrian-street Chapel last Sunday, and at the evening service there was a large congregation, when the minister's wife, Mrs. Ginever, gave a very impressive address, her subject being "The Greatest of these is Love." Mrs. Ginever pointed out how little care was given to the sick and the suffering in the ancient civilisations of the world, and contrasted graphically with this picture the love and tender compassion of the Christianity of Christ.

Deptford.—Deptford G.B. (Unitarian) Church was en fête on Wednesday evening, when Rev. A. J. Marchant celebrated his twelfth anniversary, and was publicly welcomed back after his serious illness. After tea Mr. John Harrison presided at a well-attended public gathering. He paid tribute to Mr. Marchant's worth and work, and Mr. George Ward feelingly tendered a welcome on behalf of the congregation. This was heartily supported by Messrs. J. Pallister Young, B.A., LL.D., and J. C. Pain, and Revs. T. G. M. Edwards, W. W. Chynoweth Pope, Jesse Hipperston, and Fredk. Allen. Mr. Marchant, in responding to the welcome, thanked the congregation and his many friends for their prayers and practical sympathy. The chairman first visited Deptford in 1855, when his father conducted Divine worship.

Iford.—At the annual business meeting at Broadway Chambers, where the Sunday evening services are held, Mr. E. R. Fyson, chairman and hon. treasurer, presided over a good attendance. Mr. Walter D. Welford, hon. secretary, presented an encouraging report, showing that the numbers were steadily increasing, in spite of several losses through removals from the district, and that the negotiations respecting the purchase of land in the High-road for the erection of a church were proceeding satisfactorily. The position of the site is excellent, and the purchase is to be completed on November 15. The cost is £425. The treasurer's statements showed that the year began with a deficit of 17s. 11d., and ended with a balance in hand of £2 5s. 7d. They did not owe a single penny, and had made free-will grants to several societies, and transferred £4 to their building fund. The benevolent fund showed a small balance on the right side; and the building fund amounted to £255. The reports were adopted on the motion of Mr. J. Kinsman, seconded by Mr. A. Beecroft. It was mentioned that the Ladies' Sewing Circle—of which society Miss Darlison is the hon. secretary, Mr. J. G. Foster treasurer, and Mrs. Moody president—have been preparing for a sale of work, which will be held early in December. The officers were re-elected, and a committee of nine was appointed. Mr. A. H. Laws resigned his oversight of the musical portions of the services, and proposed Mr. H. Wenman as his successor, promising to render him all the assistance in his power. The motion was agreed to, and Mr. Laws was thanked for his past services; also Miss Keeler for presiding at the instrument. A social evening to welcome the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards home again is being arranged.

Kidderminster: Opening of the New Meeting Congregational Hall.—Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., and Lady Durning-Lawrence journeyed to Kidderminster on Tuesday afternoon for the purpose of the opening formalities, and were the guests of Col. W. H. Talbot, J.P., and Mrs. Talbot, at Whitville. The new hall, which is on the north side of the New Meeting Church, in Church-street, is 70 ft. long by 34 ft. wide and 22 ft. high in the loftiest part, and is capable of accommodating 320 people. It is a really capital building, erected according to plans prepared by a local architect, Mr. A. C. Downton, of Coventry-street, and built by contract by Messrs. Dorset & Co., of Cradley Heath, at a cost of £1,266. The scheme of building such a hall had long been considered, but took no definite and practical form until the advent to Kidderminster of the present minister, the Rev. J. E. Stronge, whose efforts were heartily supported by a working committee of members of his congregation. Despite an inconvenient downpour of rain a goodly company of supporters and friends of the cause assembled at the New Meeting Church, and there awaited the arrival of the distinguished visitors, Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence. Col. Talbot, who is chairman of the Building Committee, was accompanied by Mrs. Talbot; and supporting him were the Rev. J. E. Stronge (hon. sec. to the Committee), Messrs. B. Hepworth, J.P., J. Rea, J.P., A. G. Hopkins, W. Winbury, and D. Campbell (the Building Committee), Revs. R. R. Symons (Wesleyan), E. D. Braimbridge (Congregational), J. H. Kelly (Baptist), R. Curzon (Primitive Methodist), J. Wood (Old Meeting, Birmingham), A. H. Shelley, secretary to the Midland Christian Union (Dudley), W. C. Hall (Small Heath), and C. D. Badland; Mr. Peter Adam, J.P., Mr. Byng Kenrick (President of the Midland Christian Union), and representatives of the various committees organised for the purposes of the bazaar. On the arrival of Lady Durning-Lawrence, a procession was formed to the new building, her ladyship having been presented with a golden key (given by the architect, Mr. C. A. Downton) by Miss Stooke, with a request that she would formally open the doors of the main entrance to the hall. Admission to the interior being gained, Col. Talbot escorted Lady Durning-Lawrence to the platform. At this time there was a large and representative gathering. At the rear of the ample platform was the beautiful Sunday-school banner, notifying that the schools were founded in the year 1785; and as soon as the ladies and gentlemen had taken their seats on the platform, Miss K. Watson, on behalf of the ladies of the New Meeting congregation, asked Lady Durning-Lawrence's acceptance of a bouquet of yellow and bronze chrysanthemums, to which trailing greenery was attached, and thanked her for coming to Kidderminster to open the New Meeting bazaar. After the singing of the hymn, "All people that on earth do dwell," Col. W. H. Talbot, before giving the interesting details of the undertaking for the erection of the hall, said it was a great pleasure to him to see the completion that day of a work for which the New Meeting congregation had been labouring for some ten years past. The hearts of the people, he said, had been in the work; subscriptions towards the object in view came from here and there; the necessary land for the site of the hall was obtained; and when the Rev. J. E. Stronge came to the church about two years ago he put new life into the old committee, who then began their great work with hopes of success, which had continued down to that day, when they occupied that beautiful hall for the first time. The history of the hall and of the work done had better be left in the hands of the secretary, Mr. Stronge, but he (the chairman) wished to publicly mention two families of the congregation who had greatly helped them, not only in the work but with their subscriptions. He referred to the Stooke and the Badland families, who had given 400; while many humble people living amongst them had also made great sacrifices for the cause they had at heart as a congregation, and as townspeople they ought to thank them for it. Mr. Talbot concluded by reading an apology for the absence of Ald. Parry, who sent a cheque for £2 2s. towards the building fund. The Rev. J. E. Stronge next spoke, as hon. secretary to the Building Committee, and remarked that that was not the occasion for speech making, but for buying and selling. Dealing with the early history of the scheme of building, Mr. Stronge said he was told on coming to Kidderminster that he would never raise the necessary money, a good deal of cold water being thrown upon the scheme, although the people really wanted the hall. A sum of £300 was wanted to clear off all their debts and they were trying, by means of that bazaar, to raise as much as they could; and although he did not know how much money's worth the goods on the stalls represented that afternoon, yet he ardently hoped all would be sold and the money they wanted realised before the sale came to an end. The New Meeting were a congregation that could not have a big debt. In a year and a half they had raised something like £1,200; and the friend who gave him a start when he went in fear and trembling to beg from him was Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, who gave him £25; Sir John Brunner and Mr. Byng Kenrick, chairman of the Midland Christian Union, were also handsome subscribers to the Building Fund; and though he only received £40 out of Birmingham, he was hoping that sum would be augmented in the future and that the Birmingham friends would help to clear off whatever deficit there might remain after the sale of work. Mr. Stronge said the new Congregational Hall was wanted at the New Meeting Church, because there were so many societies connected with it that needed to be properly housed and whose work might be enlarged when they had a proper place to meet in. The Guild of the Good Shepherd had a membership of over 100, and the Young People's

Social Union had greatly increased during the last two years, and there were hopes that it would double itself in the present season; and he was hoping that this institutional work connected with their church would keep the young people united to the church and bring it into their daily life, making them feel that religion was a thing for this world—to bless, comfort, and help them to struggle against the temptations and to lift themselves above the troubles and trials of life. The Rev. Joseph Wood, in a happy speech, congratulated the New Meeting congregation and the friends of their church upon the successful issue of the great work to which they had set their hands, and said he was delighted that the Kidderminster people themselves had done so well. Mr. Wood spoke of the pleasure he experienced in visiting Kidderminster, which was the home of the Guild movement in connection with the Unitarian denomination, and said it had spread to fifty other societies, each successful church possessing a successful Guild. The proper equipment of a modern church meant a great deal more than the material part of it; it indicated that that church had become not only a religious institution but a social force, and was adapting itself more and more to social reforms. Down to sixty or seventy years ago religion might be said to have consisted with the saving of one's self; to-day it consisted largely in saving one's neighbour as well; and in their new building, opened that afternoon for social use and service, very great things might be done for themselves and their church. At the New Meeting they had the people to do these things: they had an able and devoted minister, the church had many devoted friends, and it had a large congregation; and it was in their power, now they had that beautiful building at their service, to lay themselves out in various directions for useful service to the community. The Rev. E. D. Braimbridge said that the New Meeting Church was so broad and the new hall so large that it would embrace everyone who could get in, whatever might be their definite convictions religiously or socially. It had been built to do good, and as Jesus Christ went about doing good, that hall should be named after Him. He would like it to be understood that he was not the only representative of the other churches in the town, because near him were the ministers from the Primitive Methodist and Wesleyan denominations, and he said that because it must be clearly understood that the minister of the New Meeting Church in Kidderminster enjoyed the confidence and sympathy of all the other branches of the Free Churches in the town. Colonel Talbot said he thought the thanks of all were due to the architect and the builder of the new hall for having so successfully, faithfully, and straightforwardly carried out their work. Their choice in regard to both gentlemen was most fortunate. He would now ask Lady Durning-Lawrence to declare the bazaar open. (Applause.) Lady Durning-Lawrence, on rising to open the bazaar, was heartily received. She said it afforded Sir Edwin and herself very much pleasure to visit Kidderminster that afternoon. She could not say that she felt altogether in the midst of strangers, for she had often heard of Kidderminster and of their esteemed chairman, Mr. Talbot, and of all that he had done for Unitarianism and for the town of Kidderminster. She also had the great pleasure, when they were in London, of knowing their present minister and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Stronge. She had to thank the congregation, through Miss Watson, for their beautiful bouquet, and should always remember their meeting that day and the opening of their new hall through the beautiful key which Miss Stooke had most kindly presented to her. She wished them all success in the future of that hall, and felt that it was sure to be successful, because there were those belonging to the congregation and surrounding her who would make it a success. It was not only the minister who could unite and build up a congregation; a minister could not do everything; it was the committee and the congregation working with him that made the church successful. She could only again express Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence's and her own pleasure in coming to Kidderminster to open that new Congregational Hall. She had now to declare the bazaar open and hoped it would be a great success. On the motion of Mr. B. Hepworth, J.P., seconded by Mr. J. Rea, J.P., a hearty vote of thanks was tendered to Lady Durning-Lawrence for her presence and patronage. Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, on rising to acknowledge the vote of thanks, was warmly received. In a brief reply, he said he should like to give them a thought as a motto, which had been very much the comfort and guide of his life, and which, he hoped, they would take away with them and retain in their memory; it was the words of Macaulay: "It is not that vice and misery are increasing among us, but that our eyes are increasingly open to the vices and miseries that exist." He knew of nothing, added Sir Edwin, which had been such a joy to himself in life as that, and he hoped it would encourage them to put their shoulders to the wheel and help on all good works which had for their object the righting of all social and other wrongs. Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, representing the Association of Churches in the Midland District, moved the thanks of the company to Colonel Talbot for presiding. The Rev. C. D. Badland seconded, and the vote was carried with acclamation. Colonel Talbot, in reply, acknowledged the help he had received as chairman of the building committee from many quarters, and said his thanks were due to the workers and to everyone connected with the congregation, and to others outside who helped in many ways, thus showing sympathy with them in their work.

Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission.—On Sunday the harvest festival services were held. The chapel had been most attractively decorated, considerable taste having been shown by the ladies who had undertaken this. At the afternoon service for young people, the devotional part was taken by Mr. Croasdale, the assistant superintendent of the Sunday-school, and Mr. Graham, the new missionary, gave an address on "Sowing and Reaping." In the evening the chapel was crowded, seats being placed in the aisle. Mr. C. Gawler read the lessons, and Mr. Graham preached an appropriate sermon on "Thankfulness." The choir, under the able conductorship of Mr. W. G. Fry, rendered two anthems very acceptably. On the day following the harvest tea took place, and with this was coupled a welcome meeting to the new missionary. Mr. Graham has been in Bristol over two months, and immediately on his arrival a meeting of the committee and workers was held to welcome him, but the congregation expressed a wish for a more public recognition. At the evening meeting the mission hall was full, and a very genial and happy feeling pervaded the whole proceedings. Mr. Philip J. Worsley, J.P., presided, and addresses were given by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A.; Councillor Crabtree, representing the Todmorden Unitarian Church, of which Mr. Graham has been a prominent worker for a good number of years; Mr. W. Hall, Oakfield-road Church; Mr. J. Kenrick Champion, treasurer of the mission; Mr. T. Gaylard, representing the Sunday-school; Mr. W. G. Fry, on behalf of the church; and Mr. Graham. Letters of apology for non-attendance were read from the Rev. E. I. Fripp, B.A., and Mr. Colborne. A very enthusiastic spirit prevailed throughout the meeting, and the hope was expressed that the hearty welcome given to Mr. Graham would be followed by more earnest work on the part of all, and that the mission would grow both in usefulness and in numbers.

London: Essex Church.—On Wednesday next, at 8 p.m., the Rev. Frank K. Freeston will begin in the schoolroom a course of lectures on "The Story of a Heresy." These are intended to trace out the development of Unitarian thought as seen in the lives and teachings of its successive pioneers, and are arranged in the interest of inquirers, Guild members, and others.

London: Islington.—Harvest festival services took place last Sunday at Unity Church, and were especially interesting on account of the Rev. E. Savell Hicks occupying the pulpit for the first time after his return from the Boston Congress. The reading of the lessons by Mr. Hicks always rivets the attention, and his rendering of various passages from the Psalms in the morning was very impressive, the final verse forming the text of his sermon: "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord. Praise ye the Lord." The sermons, both morning and evening, were eloquent and inspiring, and contained a few references to his experiences in America. Appropriate anthems were sung by an augmented choir, with much power and expression. The decorations of the church were very artistic, and were arranged by the ladies, the teachers, and Sunday scholars. Friends from a distance united with the congregation in very kindly supplying corn, fruit, flowers, and autumnal gleanings—golden bracken from Aviemore being grouped with silvery honesty from Weybridge and teasles from Bognor. Large congregations assembled at both services, especially in the evening, when the church was crowded. At the harvest festival there is always a reunion of old friends, and after the evening service an opportunity is given for social intercourse, as a short informal gathering is held in the schoolroom, when visitors may, if desired, become acquainted with the minister and the officers. Last Sunday evening, Mr. Alfred Wilson, the treasurer, took advantage of the meeting, and offered a few words of hearty welcome to the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, upon his return home; to which the latter warmly responded in his usual genial manner. It is rumoured that on one of the Literary Society's Thursdays, Mr. Hicks will give an account of his visit to America, and his impressions of the Boston Conference.

London: Kentish Town.—On Sunday last the harvest thanksgiving services were held, conducted in the morning and evening by the minister, the Rev. F. Hankinson. There were large congregations. In the afternoon there was a children's service conducted by Mr. A. Savage Cooper (the president of the Laymen's Club). The children from the Rhyl-street Mission had been invited, and attended in large numbers. The church was very prettily decorated. Mr. Hankinson is doing an excellent work in Kentish Town, and is cultivating the social side of the church life. The social institute inaugurated by him has been very successful, and the programme for the coming session (which opens on November 7 next with a talk on Women's Suffrage by Mrs. Pethwick Lawrence) bids fair to rival its predecessors.

London: Stepney Green.—Encouraging harvest thanksgiving services were held last Sunday. A series of Sunday evening addresses has been arranged dealing with topics raised during the Van Mission. Among the week-night activities just resumed are singing and dancing classes conducted by ladies, Band of Hope, Life Saving Club, the Temperance Society under the leadership of Mr. W. R. Marshall.

London: Stoke Newington Green.—A series of quite remarkable sermons on "The Lord's Prayer" are being delivered morning and evening, during this month, to enlarging congregations, by the newly-appointed minister, Dr. Foat, M.A., who is perhaps known in educational circles, at present, more widely than in religious. Dr. Foat—whose Doctor's degree is in literature, and whose Master's Arts degree, as well as his D.Lit., was won at the London University—is still a young man with the future well before him. Dr. Foat's texts on Sunday last were, in the morning, "As it is done in Heaven," and in the evening, "Our Daily Bread." Both sermons displayed a depth of knowledge and insight, wide reading and culture, and an original bent of mind which illuminated the old theme and the too familiar words with new and surprising light and force, and revealed a profound understanding of the religious, social, and economic conditions which operate in the midst of, and constitute a challenge to the churches of to-day, to which, the preacher urged, the churches must be prepared to give some answer and guidance, if they were to retain their hold upon the people. Next Sunday, Dr. Foat will deal with the clauses, "Forgive us our Trespases" and "Lead us not into Temptation." The musical portion of the services at "the Green" are bright and inspiring, and the choir, under the able and genial conductorship of Mr. F. W. Turner, does not assert itself aggressively over the congregation, but just renders that leadership which is most helpful to congregational singing, of which Newington-green furnishes so excellent an example. The whole service, whether in the more liturgical form of the morning, or the freer and more untrammelled and spontaneous form of the evening, is surely worshipful and Christian; and we think if it were more widely known in the neighbourhood, that before the Bi-centennial celebrations of next year the Church would find itself too straitened to contain the worshippers.

Middlesbrough.—The harvest thanksgiving services were held in the above church on Sunday last. The services were conducted by the pastor, Rev. W. H. Lambelle. The thanksgiving service was of twofold interest, including the welcome home of the pastor after his visit to America. Large congregations assembled at each service. On Monday a fruit banquet was held, and a sale of fruit brought to a close a successful festival. On October 2 the winter session was opened by a social evening, arranged and carried out by the young men of the church. It was well attended and very encouraging. During the absence of Mr. Lambelle the services have been conducted by lay preachers, and the thanks of committee and congregation are due to them all for the conduct of the services.

Midland Lay Preachers' Association.—The bulk of the members of this Association met at Waverley-road Church, Small Heath, Birmingham, on Saturday afternoon last. Mr. W. H. Nightingale presided, and Mr. R. A. Clarke read a paper on "Emerson and Popular Theology." Criticisms followed, the object of the meeting being the mutual assistance of the members by free speech on the strength and weakness of their utterances. A very stimulating and helpful exercise resulted, and it was determined to follow up the meeting by a similar one in January, when Mr. Frank Taylor, of Stourbridge, will submit a sermon for criticism. Mr. Clarke was cordially thanked for his excellent paper.

Newchurch.—On Saturday interesting gatherings were held in connection with Bethlehem Unitarian Church, Newchurch, at the installation of the new minister, the Rev. James Shaw Brown. The proceedings commenced by a service in the church in the afternoon, at which an excellent sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., D.D., D.Litt., principal of the Manchester New College, Oxford. At 5.45 an organ recital was given by Mr. R. O. Holt. In the evening there was a public meeting in the church. Mr. John Horsfield, president of the church, occupied the chair, and was supported by Principal Carpenter, the Rev. J. Shaw Brown, Rev. R. T. Herford (Stand), Rev. T. B. Evans (Heywood), Rev. A. W. Fox (Todmorden), Rev. W. Rupert Clark (U.M.F.C., minister, Newchurch), Rev. Rhoslyn Davies (Rawtenstall Unitarian), Mr. David Healey (Heywood), Mr. James Edward Ashworth, and Mr. R. J. Hall (a student at the New Manchester College, Oxford). Principal Carpenter, who had a very warm greeting, said it gave him great pleasure to take some share in the ordination of Mr. Brown. It was always interesting to a teacher to see those with whom he has been connected, if only for a short time, going forth to an occupation which he held to be the most important one in life. And on this occasion he took an especial interest in the event, partly because their previous minister, Mr. Shaw, went through the same college, and because he had heard from him of the strenuousness and energy of that congregation; and partly because he felt how much a religious communion was enriched by those who came to them, as Mr. Shaw Brown had done, from other churches, bringing them the experience they had gained in different fields, and the sincerity of conviction which had led them into their own fellowship. He felt sure they would have in Mr. Brown a leader who would be in the highest degree helpful to their life and work, and he earnestly desired that many years of prosperous ministry and deepening affection may unite him and them together. But they must not forget that the success of the work of the church also depended largely on themselves. He along with his brother ministers knew how great was the inspiration and support that came to them from well-filled pews and regular attendance. That had much to do with a church's vitality and effectiveness. Let them open their hearts to their minister when he visited them in their homes, and let him know when they felt his ministrations had been helpful to them. Then they must not forget the duty of the church to the outside public—to those, he meant, who showed no interest in religion, and who were wandering away from all those higher things of morality and faith which it was the duty of their church to foster. They must make warfare against worldliness and sin. More and more were the churches being drawn together to co-operate in work for the good of all. May that church take its share in that great work, and may the presence of ministers of other denominations there that night be a prophecy to Mr. Brown of the strength they may receive from them, and which they in their turn may render to their common cause. (Applause.) Mr. David Healey, of Heywood, welcomed Mr. Brown on behalf of the North-East Lancashire Unitarian Missions. He hoped the teachers and scholars would make great efforts to carry the work at that place to a grand and successful end. He had much pleasure in extending the welcome to Mr. Brown. (Applause.) The Rev. T. B. Evans (Heywood) extended a cordial welcome to Mr. Brown on behalf of the neighbouring Unitarian churches. The Rev. A. W. Fox (Tadmorden) gave Mr. Brown a similar welcome on behalf of the North-East Lancashire Unitarian Sunday School Union. Rev. W. Rupert Clark (Bethesda U.M.F.C.) said, speaking as a Methodist, he might say their differences were superficial and their agreements were fundamental. (Hear, hear.) They were all making against any form of wrong, and were desirous of seeing the kingdom of righteousness come upon earth. (Hear, hear.) As one with a different doctrine to their own he very heartily and cordially welcomed Mr. Brown to Newchurch; assured him of his brotherly regard, and as far as possible his cordial co-operation. He trusted he would have good health; the favour of the people; the blessing of God; and a most successful ministry. (Applause.) On the motion of the Rev. J. Shaw Brown, seconded by Mr. George W. Hitchen, a hearty vote of thanks was passed to Principal Carpenter, the other ministers on the platform, the members of the Ladies' Aid, and the corresponding secretary, Mr. George Howarth.

Swinton.—The Rev. Wm. McMullan, who has succeeded the Rev. W. E. George, M.A., as pastor of Swinton Unitarian Church, was formally inducted to the ministry at a special service held in the Church on Saturday afternoon. The service, which was well attended, was conducted by the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., tutor at the Home Missionary College, Victoria Park, Manchester, where Mr. McMullan was until recently a student. He urged that the cultivation of the higher life should ever be the main object of the preacher, and that to that end he should devote his best energies, remembering that matters social and political were, after all, secondary considerations. He hoped, too, that whilst the congregation as a whole would have the benefit of the minister's zeal and devotion, the children would be his special care, since upon them would devolve the church work of the future.—The anthem, "Praise the Lord, ye heavens adore Him," having been sung by the choir, the Rev. Principal Gordon, M.A., proceeded to give the customary charge to the congregation. In an eloquent address he pointed out the duties of the congregation towards the minister, duties which, he said, were all the more responsible because in the appointment the congregation had exercised an absolutely free choice. Apart from regular attendance at the services of the church, it was the duty of the congregation to cordially support the minister in every department of his work, and to encourage him in the arduous task he had undertaken. The Rev. Ambrose Bennett, M.A., of Monton, then welcomed his young colleague to the ministry, and in extending to him the right hand of fellowship expressed on behalf of the neighbouring sister church the hope that his labours would be blessed. In responding to the welcome, the Rev. W. McMullan referred in feeling terms to the valuable work accomplished by his predecessor at that church, and said he should strive to be a worthy successor. He would endeavour to pursue his work in a progressive missionary spirit, and to spread as far as possible the Unitarian faith, which, because of its simplicity, would commend itself to all men. An impressive service concluded with the singing of Charles Wesley's hymn, "Speak with us, Lord, Thyself reveal." The school-room was well filled for the meeting which took place in the evening, when the new pastor received a most enthusiastic welcome. The proceedings were presided over by Mr. Richard Robinson of Bowdon, formerly of Swinton Park, and amongst those present were the Revs. Principal Gordon, M.A., P. M. Higginson, M.A., A. Bennett, M.A., Neander Anderton, B.A. (Pendleton), H. Dawtrey, B.A. (Broughton), and Miles Hanson (Trinity Congregational Church); Councillor Higgin (Monton), Mr. Fletcher Robinson (Pendleton), and Mr. Geo. H. Leigh. A number of students from the Home Missionary College also attended to join in the welcome to their former colleague. The church secretary (Mr. J. Cadman) read letters which he had received from three former pastors of the church (Revs. W. Harrison, J. Moore, and W. E. George), also the Rev. P. Carrotte and Mr. J. Birkby, expressing regret at their inability to attend, and their best wishes for the success of Mr. McMullan's ministry. The chairman, in the name of the church and school, offered the new pastor a hearty welcome, and said that, speaking from his own experience of the congregation whilst staying at Swinton, Mr. McMullan would find that the people of whom he would have charge were kind and warm-hearted, and ready to support him to the best of their power. The Rev. Miles Hanson, who was cordially received, spoke in felicitous terms of Mr. McMullan's advent to the district, and said, as a neighbouring minister, he bade him welcome as a fellow-worker in the great cause they all had at heart. Principal Gordon expressed his good wishes in a speech couched in humorous vein, and the Rev. N. Anderton added a welcome on behalf of the Manchester and District Presbyterian Churches. Mr. McMullan received an ovation on rising to respond, the whole audience rising and applauding with great heartiness. Speaking with considerable emotion, he thanked the congregation for the warmth of their welcome, and assured them that nothing should remain lacking on his part to make himself worthy of their good wishes.

Taunton.—Very effective was the decoration of Mary-street Chapel for the harvest festival on Sunday, Oct. 6, considerable care having been taken to arrange the flowers, fruit, and other harvest emblems to the best advantage. The ladies responsible for the work included Mrs. C. J. Goodland, Mrs. Duckworth, Mrs. Philpott, the Misses Philpott, Mrs. Bond, Mrs. Rex, and Miss Venner, and their kindly efforts were much appreciated by the congregation. The Rev. R. Finnerty, of Ilminster, was the preacher for the day, and his appropriate sermons were listened to by good congregations. At the evening service the choir gave an admirable rendering of the anthem "The Lord is good" (Caleb Simper), the solo being effectively taken by Miss Duckworth, while the quartette was sung by Miss Duckworth, Miss Tottle, Mr. J. Duckworth, and Mr. Philpott. Altogether the choir sang exceedingly well, rendering the well known harvest hymns as well as the anthem. Miss Philpott ably presided at the organ. In the afternoon a successful musical service was held for the children, who heartily joined in the singing of special hymns and anthems. They had been trained by Miss Philpott and Miss Venner. Another pleasing feature of this service was the offerings of flowers made by the scholars to be afterwards sent to the sick and aged members of the congregation. The children were addressed by the Rev. R. Finnerty. As in former years the collections for the day were on behalf of the Taunton and Somerset Hospital.

Wandsworth.—On Sunday last the Rev. W. G. Tarrant was "welcomed home" after his tour in Canada and his visit to the Boston Council by the congregation and Sunday-school. There were large attendances, in the evening overflowing, and hearty greetings were given not only to the minister, but also to the secretary, Mr. H. B. Lawford, who as past-president of the Laymen's Club has had a conspicuous share in the meetings at Boston and elsewhere. The services were of a specially joyous character, combining the harvest thanksgiving with a commemoration of the twenty-second anniversary of the opening of the church building. In the morning Mr. Tarrant spoke of the marvellous power given to man, and the need of consecrating it to highest uses; in the evening he invited "hermit" thinkers to come from their seclusion to gain and give the benefits of religious fellowship. The festival music, under the direction of Mr. H. W. James, was much appreciated; and the decorations, which included a large inscription on the porch screen—"Welcome Home"—were appropriately beautiful. All points forward to a season of unusual activity.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

We deeply regret to note the death of Mr. William Wallace Bruce, which took place on Sunday morning last at his residence, 9, Airlie-gardens, W. The funeral service took place on Thursday at Essex Church, and was conducted by Rev. F. K. Freeston. We hope to publish an obituary notice next week, and also a report of the funeral service.

At the annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of Non-Subscribing Congregations of London and the South-Eastern Counties, at Hampstead, Thursday, October 24, 1907, the following resolution on the death of Mr. William Wallace Bruce was moved by the President, Rev. F. H. Jones, B.A., and was carried in silence, all standing:—

“That this Assembly has heard with profound regret of the death of Mr. William Wallace Bruce, ex-President of the Assembly. During the two years of Mr. Bruce's presidency his diligent attention to its affairs and his appreciation of the importance of its work made a deep impression on all who had the privilege of working with him. The Committee owe much to his judgment and advice, and to him were due in a large measure some of the most useful and helpful proceedings of the past year arising from valuable suggestions thrown out in his Presidential Address in 1906.

“The Assembly desires also to place on record its high appreciation of the work done by Mr. Bruce for the public good when a member of the London County Council, and more especially the active part he took as Chairman of the Housing Committee, in ameliorating the conditions of life for the poorer citizens of London.

“The Assembly tenders its sincere and respectful sympathy to Mrs. Bruce and the family.”

THE Liberation Society's Committee, at their meeting this week, adopted the following resolution:—

“In recording the death, at an advanced age, of Mr. Carvell Williams, the Committee wish to place on record their grateful appreciation of the long and distinguished service he rendered as the Society's chief official representative. In administration, on the platform, in the Press, and for some years as a member of the House of Commons, he was conspicuous for his ability, energy, and zeal in promoting the cause of religious liberty, and in effecting the legislative reforms of laws which, growing out of an antiquated ecclesiastical system of privilege, weighed heavily on Non-conformists. He lived to see many religious inequalities removed, and died in the full assurance of faith that the early separation of the Church from the State was inevitable. They convey to his son and other relatives their sympathy in the present sorrow, though they are thankful that he has had a happy issue out of his late great afflictions, and that his very considerable service is now a happy and pious memory.”

At the Congregational Union meetings at Blackpool last week, Education, Temperance, the Land Question, and Disestablishment were warmly discussed. The Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church of England was declared necessary “in the interests alike of religious liberty, ecclesiastical concord, and educational progress.” Dr. Horton and the Rev. J. H. Jowett delivered searching addresses on the Deepening of the Spiritual Life. Mr. Jowett emphasised the importance of distinguishing between “life” and “the means of living,” the means having come, too commonly, to be regarded as the end, as life itself. He deprecated vulgar show in the home, and the assumption that showy living is essential life. He called for a concentration of energy on the direct end of high thinking and deep living, insisting that “when a man thinks loftily he lives deeply.”

THE Rev. W. J. Butler, of Peterborough, read a very practical paper on “The Grouping of Congregational Churches.” He drew a picture of the struggling minister of a small congregation, the slender margin of his slender salary going in charity instead of books, and himself starving for fellowship with minds and men. He asked whether it was really necessary that each little church should have its own minister. Something more was wanted than doles and grants. They wanted a grouping or federation of the churches. But he did not mean by this the grouping of two or three weak churches joined to one another, but left apart from all others. Grouping which was to be of any vital value must be a federation of all the churches, great and small, strong and weak. They must learn from Methodism—as Methodism had in other matters learned from them—and circuitise their churches. Such a departure was not impossible to Congregationalism, for it had been brought about in Wolverhampton, which has a central church with eight branch churches, a minister, two assistant ministers, and a staff of twenty-five lay preachers. He believed that nothing would do their churches so much good as a strenuous call on their laymen for service of this kind.

DR. POWICKE introduced a discussion on “The Relation between Theology and the Spiritual Life.” This relation he summarised under the following heads:—

(1) Spiritual life is primary, and is operative in myriads of souls that know nothing of theology, as the life of sensation and perception is active in many who know nothing of biology and psychology.

(2) The immediate effects of spiritual life are given in those emotional—generally instinctive—attitudes of reverence, trust, gratitude, self-abasement, aspiration which are connoted by the term religion, and are expressed in various religious cults.

(3) Theology begins with the first conscious effort of reflective thought to analyse, account for, formulate the contents of religion, or religious experience.

(4) Theology, at any given stage of religious experience, will be felt as satisfactory, will be alive, so far as its form seems to be an intelligible and adequate reflection of that experience.

(5) A completely true theology presupposes not merely an intelligible and adequate reflection of the religious or spiritual life, but also, and still more, the purity of that life—i.e., its full correspondence with the life of God.

(6) And this is conditioned by two factors—on the one hand, by God's progressive revelation of Himself to man, and, on the other, by man's progressive assimilation of what is revealed.

(7) Given, then, a complete revelation of God, a spiritual life completely responsive to that revelation, and a completely adequate intellectual explication of that spiritual life, the result would be a theology altogether true.

WESLEYAN Methodists have long been feeling the need of a broader basis of church membership. This desire was recognised by the last Conference, and committees were appointed to deal with the subject. The chief question at issue is, Shall the Class Meeting continue to be the only door into the Church, or shall the wider door of the Society be thrown open? Both policies have their advocates. But, of course, neither party wishes to abolish the Class Meeting. The party of reform would retain it, but no longer regard it as an essential to membership of the Church. The conservative party is opposed to the change on the ground that it would enormously weaken the power and utility of the Class Meeting, which has hitherto been a vital part of Methodism. Without doubt, the Class Meetings, wherever they are well organised under strong leaders, work well, and are a bulwark of strength to the churches. But sometimes their organisation is defective, and their leadership indifferent. An earnest and intelligent Methodist may find himself domiciled in a neighbourhood where he cannot endure the Class Meeting. He wishes to belong to the Society, but he fights shy of joining a Class. Or it may be that he has reached a liberal outlook which ill consorts with this institution in any circumstances. It is felt that for all such there should be a direct way into the Society. It is also felt that the modern Guild meetings, which are largely attended by young people in lieu of Class Meetings, should be an equally valid introduction to membership of the Society, which is, to all intents and purposes, identical with membership of the Church. The findings of the Committees to whom the matter has been referred are awaited with interest.

THE following extract from a letter of Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas to the Nottingham Express lays stress on a distinction which is too often forgotten:—

"May I take this opportunity of making a definite correction, I hope, once and for all? You refer to the High-pavement Unitarian Chapel. The High-pavement Chapel is not, never has been, and, one may be sure, never will be, officially called a 'Unitarian' chapel. It heartily welcomes into its comprehensive fellowship Unitarians and others who either cannot honestly worship elsewhere, or, while being able to worship everywhere, prefer to worship in an undogmatic atmosphere. Its present members (with some exceptions) would be rightly described as Unitarians. But the congregation in its historical and living continuity, in its trust-deeds, regulations, and actual present practice is absolutely free and democratic, and repudiates all manner of theological tests. Neither candidates for membership nor ministers are asked their theological opinions. The first and basal rule of our constitution provides 'No person shall be excluded from membership on account of his or her theological opinions.'

"You will therefore understand why I object to attaching a doctrinal label to a church that has been scrupulously careful to avoid all such labels and to offer an open hospitality to people of any and every theological complexion. The classical utterance on this matter of naming our chapels is Dr. Martineau's: 'If anyone, being a Unitarian, shrinks, on fitting occasion, from plainly calling himself so, he is a sneak and a coward. If, being of our catholic communion, he calls his chapel or its congregation Unitarian, he is a traitor to his spiritual ancestry, and a deserter to the camp of its persecutors.' The distinction is obvious and important, for the chapel or congregation may and does include those who are not Unitarians."

THE following extraordinary letter has been recently discovered, and appears in the Pittsburg Gazette Times, to remind us of the view taken in Boston in 1682 of "the heretics and malignants called Quakers":—

Boston, Sept. ye 15th, 1682.

To ye Aged and Beloved John Hutchinson

There be at sea a shippe called ye Welcome, R. Greenaway, master, which has aboard an hundred or more of ye heretics and malignants called Quakers, with W. Penne, who is ye chief scampe, at the head of them. Ye general court has accordingly given secret orders to Master Malachi Huxett of ye brig Propasse to waylaye sed Welcome as near ye coast of Codde as may be and make captive ye sed Penne and his ungodly crewe so that ye Lord may be glorified and not mocked on ye soil of this new countre with ye heathen worships of these people.

Much spoyle may be made by selling ye whole lot to Barbadoes, where slaves fetch goode prices in rumme and sugar, and shall not only do ye Lord great service in punishing the wicked, but we shall make great good for his ministers and people. Master Huxett feels hopeful, and I will set down ye news when his shippe comes back. Yours in ye bowels of Christ.

COTTON MATHER.

In the page of last week's Friend devoted to the work of the Friends' Social Union there is a useful article on Wages Boards in Victoria. It appears that the Act of 1896 established Boards, consisting of workmen and employers, to fix the legal minimum wage in certain sweated trades, including baking, bootmaking, shirtmaking, men's clothing, and furniture making. A further Act (1905) renders a favourable resolution in both Houses of the Legislature necessary before a special Board may be appointed. Each Board agrees upon an impartial chairman, or, failing agreement, he is appointed by the Governor. The chief inspector has power to issue permits to old and infirm workers enabling them to work for wages below the minimum fixed. The decisions of the Boards are rendered binding by a proviso that the worker can always recover the balance between the wages received and the legal minimum by action in a court of law. The Boards appear to have been completely successful in eliminating sweating in certain trades, as, for example, the clothing trade. In 1901 the chief inspector reported that sweating in that trade was extinct, a revolution having been effected in three years. As a rule, employers and workers are both satisfied with the results of the system; but it has naturally raised the price of certain articles in a country protected by a high tariff. It is estimated that of the 64,000 factory workers of Victoria, some 46,000 are employed under the regulations of Wages Boards.

MRS. CREIGHTON spoke wisely to an assembly of high school girls who crowded the Midland Hall in Manchester on the eve of the annual convention of the National Union of Women Workers of Great Britain and Ireland. The chief enemies of the further progress of women, she said, were women themselves. If women claimed liberty, they must also share in the work of the world, and not be like those American women who claimed freedom to do what they liked and yet were content to be maintained as playthings and ornaments by their men-folks. Mrs. Creighton's warning is undoubtedly needed, for while the modern woman's movement is, in the main, due to a desire on the part of women to be taken more seriously and to be recognised as fellow-workers on an equality with men, many are met with in England, as well as America, who have a quite inadequate idea of the added duties and responsibilities which come with greater freedom and increase of direct influence in public affairs. It is hardly reasonable to expect all the luxurious comforts and immunities and flatteries of a sheltered existence together with the power and the prizes that belong to the struggling life of the world.

THE hopes of a settlement of the railway dispute are increased by the knowledge that Mr. Lloyd George is meeting with directors of the railway companies in an informal way to learn directly from them their view of the situation. Mr. Bell has expressed confidence that if Mr. Lloyd George intervenes, it will not be in the interest of either railway employees or shareholders, recognising that it is his duty as a Minister of the Crown to act in the interests of the general community, not specially on behalf of either workers or employers. Meanwhile, what may be called the fighting strength of the railway servants is increasing. At a joint conference of railway workers' unions at Manchester, five other unions resolved to unite forces with the Amalgamated Society, bringing up the number of men thus acting in concert to over 140,000. The results of the ballot of the Amalgamated Society as to whether they are prepared to strike will be known after October 28, when the votes will be counted, and will be declared at Caxton Hall, Westminster, on November 3.

THE National Anti-Gambling League reports the holding of 140 meetings during the summer, including talks with workmen during the dinner hour, the special time for betting tips and news. A special ten days' campaign with a van and lantern was held in Bradford, which appears to have encouraged the authorities in their struggle with the evil. The League collects information—for example, about limericks, and other forms of press gambling—with a view to prosecution or police action. It now desires to concentrate attention on suppression of gambling advertisements, and the use of mails and telegraphs for betting.

AFTER THE INTERNATIONAL. AT CHICAGO.

THE four of us who attended the Michigan State Conference at Ann Arbor went on to Chicago on Friday, October 4, and the Rev. L. G. Wilson there said good-bye to us, going still further West to another State Conference at Minneapolis. At Chicago the remaining three of us, as guests from across the Atlantic, received a most cordial welcome, and after a week-end full of interest finally separated to go our several ways.

The writer of these notes is very glad to have been in Chicago. He had the privilege of preaching on Sunday morning (October 6) in Unity Church—not the Unity Church built for Robert Collyer after the great fire, but a humbler successor, a pleasant little church, built further to the north, where the congregation, after a period of discouragement, are now showing a new spirit of energy and hopefulness under the ministry of the Rev. F. V. Hawley. That it is still Collyer's old congregation is witnessed not only by the continuing name of the church but by the blacksmith's anvil and the face of the happy preacher on one side of the pulpit, "the man of cheerful yesterdays and confident to-morrows," in the original cast of the fine marble bust which is in one of the city libraries.

The first Unitarian Society (the Church of the Messiah) to which Brooke Herford ministered when he first went to America, with a large church nearer the centre of the city, does not prosper, but its minister, the Rev. W. H. Pulsford, has also a more hopeful work in his hands at the Memorial Chapel, immediately adjoining the Chicago University, some four miles further to the south.

Midway between these two at the corner of Oakwood Boulevard and Langley Avenue is the Abraham Lincoln Centre, which was our home during our brief visit to Chicago. The building is a great six-storied block, bearing on either side of its front entrance a bronze tablet, with these inscriptions: "The Abraham Lincoln Centre, 1905. Let us have faith that right makes might and in that faith dare to do our duty." "This building is dedicated to public service, honouring the memory of Abraham Lincoln, Democrat." And within the severely plain square entrance, wide open to all comers, is a further bronze declaring that this is the home of All Souls Church, with its motto, "Here let no man be stranger." Lincoln Centre is a hive of manifold activities, religious, social, educational, and philanthropic, and it is also the home (on the fifth story) of the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones and some of the chief of his workers. The central space of the second and third stories is devoted to the auditorium of All Souls Church, and there on Sunday morning Dr. Hunter preached to a large congregation, while in the evening a union meeting was held, in which the three visitors took part with Mr. Jones and the Revs. C. A. Osborne, F. V. Hawley, and M. Allais, of the French Methodist Episcopal Church. In the morning, Professor Montet also preached in a church of another connection, the name of which has escaped my memory. In November Mr. Jones is to celebrate the completion of twenty-five years service as minister of all Souls Church, the earlier home of which, just across the road, opened in 1886, now stands unoccupied, waiting, as he hopes, to be used for some other beneficent purpose.

We were not only most cordially received at Lincoln Centre, but our friends ensured for us a welcome opportunity of seeing a good deal of the nobler side of the life of their great city. The morning after our arrival three friendly motor cars were placed at our disposal, that, with a small company of brother ministers, we might cover the ground with the utmost speed and see as many notable things as was possible in the time. As Chicago stretches for 26 miles along the Lake shore, and two of our points were certainly eight miles apart, and the distance had to be covered twice and crossed and recrossed in making other visits, it was a most timely help we thus received. Along the splendid boulevards we flew with the wind, but at other times, it must be confessed, taking cross roads, we ploughed through unimaginable morasses, and bumped over mountainous obstructions, on what we must suppose was once a road. We did not visit the stock-yards, though we could not escape their unsavoury neighbourhood; nor did we go to Marshall Field's, "the biggest store in the world." We went first right through the city, along the beautiful Lake-shore drive to Lincoln Park on the north, where stands Saint Gauden's noble statue of Abraham Lincoln, the plain man, in his rugged strength, standing there, bare-headed, wrapt in profound thought, the friend of the oppressed and the saviour of his country. The statue was erected twenty years ago, and on the stonework which encircles it there are two inscriptions carved, of the President's own words, part of the first of which Lincoln Centre also had adopted: "Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us to the end dare to do our duty as we understand it." "With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on."

From North to South again we were carried to the spacious grounds of the Chicago University, where we were received by Professor Shailer Mathews, Dean of the Theological Faculty, and having been shown over some of the buildings, were hospitably entertained at lunch by members of the Faculty. It was a special pleasure to meet there Professor G. Burman Foster, whose remarkable work on "The Finality of the Christian Religion" was recently noticed by Mr. Whitaker in THE INQUIRER. Dr. Burman Foster was too great a heretic to be tolerated in the Theological Faculty, of which he was formerly a member, and which is tied down under Baptist denominational control. The difficulty was happily met by his transference to a freer position in the University as Professor of the Philosophy of Religion. The second volume of his book, which is to contain the more constructive part of his work, will appear, it is hoped before the end of the present year. Chicago University, which has both men and women students, has this novel feature, that it is in constant session, with four terms in the year, and thus enables large numbers of teachers to come up for the summer vacation term, and so obtain a cumulative benefit of university training.

Central Chicago is circled by a chain of beautiful parks, ending North and South on the Lake shore and linked together by broad boulevards with delightful avenues of trees, and besides these, much has already been done in the establishment of municipal play-grounds for the children and spacious recreation grounds, with baths and gymnasium both for men and women. One of these which we visited had also a library and reading room, and a popular restaurant, and a depôt for the distribution of milk specially prepared for little children. Our first visit after lunch was to the University Settlement in a very dreary neighbourhood west of the stock-yards, where Miss Mary McDowell is doing a splendid work amid a strangely mixed population of Bohemians, Poles, Lithuanians, and others. The sensational revelations of "The Jungle," she said, had brought a good deal of distress to her people, through the crippling of their industry, and the distress would have been much worse if it had not been for the large amount of public works in progress, to which the labourers could turn. And the book had done ultimate good in compelling public attention, and the reforms which were now being effected. The sensational character of the book arose from its crowding all the horrors into one canvas, but everything there pictured had actually happened somewhere and at some time or other, and worse horrors still. Miss McDowell has six other residents helping in her work at the settlement.

Later in the afternoon we went to Hull House, with its thirty residents, "a centre for higher civic and social life," founded in 1889, the Toynbee Hall of Chicago, of which Miss Jane Addams has been from the first the head and the inspiration. It has grown step by step into a great institution, and it is typical of the noble spirit of unselfish service which is doing so much in many ways for the welfare of the people of Chicago. There are not less than twenty social settlements of one kind or another in the city, and of these Hull House, with perhaps one other, is certainly the chief.

On Monday the visitors were again entertained at luncheon in the city, this time by the Outlook Club, a body of liberal ministers of various denominations, and in the evening a very pleasant farewell reception was given to them at Lincoln Centre. The speeches they made, not to mention sermons, in those two crowded days, are in the retrospect a wonder to contemplate! But it is good to have been in Chicago, and to realise that it is not a huge mass of materialism and ugliness. There are those who have faith in its future as the chief city of America, and that must be a city of high ideals and noble manhood.

Here ends the specific post-international pilgrimage, and from Chicago only solitary travellers went their several ways. This particular one left on Monday night (October 7) by the Erie road for Meadville, where he was to lecture on Unitarianism in England on Tuesday evening. But the Erie eried to such an extent that he arrived nearly four hours late (and at one point had been quite prepared to stay out a second night in the amiable sleeping car), so that no lecture could be given, and place had to be found for two on the following day instead. Meadville is a charming little town, in hilly country (1,000 ft. above sea level), and with its open, friendly roads and avenues of trees reminded one of Ann Arbor. The Theological School stands on high ground and is very pleasantly situated. President Southworth many of our friends may remember to have seen at Geneva two years ago, and in Liverpool on his way home. The staff of professors has been strengthened this year by the advent of Dr. H. Preserved Smith, who takes the Old Testament Chair. His expulsion some years ago from the Lane Theological Seminary at Cincinnati, on account of heresy, will be remembered. Dr. Smith is author of the volume on "Samuel" in the International Critical Commentary and of a notable work on Old Testament history. Last year there were 24 students in the Meadville school, including 9 special students, and the new session, we believe, has opened with even more, and among them men of seven different nationalities.

What the Eric did with this traveller next day shall remain untold, but he closes his letter within hearing of Niagara.

NEW LIGHT ON THE NEW TESTAMENT.*

THE illustration of the New Testament by recently discovered texts of the Græco-Roman world is the object of the five popular lectures originally delivered in Frankfort by Professor Deissmann, which, after appearing in translation in the Expository Times, are now given to us in a handy little volume.

It is especially to the newly discovered wealth of what our author calls "non-literary" material that he addresses himself. The literature, strictly so called, of the Græco-Roman period has constantly been adduced to afford contrasts and point morals; to show a vitiated and enfeebled society tottering to its fall, while the new power of Christianity, advancing from the East, proves its title to the dominion of the world by the possession of every virtue which wealth and luxury had extirpated among the representatives of empire. Now, this, urges Deissmann, is to compare things not comparable. The world of the historian and the satirist was not the world with which Christianity had relations at the beginning of its career.

"By its very nature, Primitive Christianity stood contrasted with the upper class, not at first as Christianity, but as a movement of the proletarian lower class. The corresponding pagan class is, therefore, alone commensurable with Primitive Christianity at the outset. This class, practically lost to the historian hitherto, has now, thanks to the discovery of its own written memorials, suddenly come forth from the rubbish-heaps of ancient cities, towns, and villages. . . . This, in our opinion, is the widest and most important significance of the non-literary texts of the imperial period—that they enable us to correct the one-sided view of the ancient world as seen from above, by setting us in the midst of the social class in which we must imagine St. Paul working, from which we must imagine Christianity making its first recruits."

While the papyri dug up from the rubbish-heaps of Egypt have added whole works to the resources of the classical scholars, and very valuable fragments to the stores of Christian literature, it is the indirect value of the remains that have no claim to be classed as literature that Deissmann wishes to emphasise; and he treats of this, first, with reference to the philology of the New Testament; secondly, with reference to its literary character; and, thirdly, in relation to the history of religion, as illustrating points of contact and difference between Primitive Christianity and the ancient world. As to the texts themselves, they may be divided into three classes, according to the material on which they are written—viz., inscriptions on stone, metal, or wax tablets; texts on papyri; and texts on potsherds (ostraca) and wooden tablets. Of inscriptions our author says but little. It is from the other two sources that the newest light is to be derived. Since 1778, "when an unknown European dealer in antiquities bought from Egyptian peasants a papyrus containing documents of the year 191-192 A.D.," and saw them burn about fifty similar papyri in order to enjoy the aromatic scent of the smoke, thousands of such documents have found their way into libraries and museums. But the serious and connected study of them was hardly begun before the date of the discovery and excavation of the vast accumulations of papyrus leaves and fragments in the Fayûm, in the year 1877. It is not the library, but the rubbish-heap, that is yielding to the spade its contents, "as varied as life itself"—old accounts, leases, receipts, petitions, family letters, charms, &c., in all sorts of languages and scripts. But it is, of course, with the Greek fragments that Deissmann has mostly to deal. These cover a period of about a thousand years, beginning with the third century B.C. They reveal the common life and the common language of Græco-Roman Egypt. And for the study of these another source is found in the ostraca (inscribed potsherds).

"The ostraca are, in a still greater degree than the papyri, documents of the lower class of the population. The potsherd was the cheapest possible writing material, such as everybody could fetch for himself from the rubbish-heap free of cost. The ostrakon was, therefore, considered below the social dignity of well-to-do people; and it is interesting to note how in many Coptic letters that are written on potsherds the writers beg their correspondents to excuse their having to use an ostrakon for want of papyrus. The embarrassment of these polite persons is matter of congratulation for us, for the ostraca lead us into the very midst of the class of society in which Primitive Christianity took root."

Our author proceeds to illustrate the importance of these non-literary texts to the historian of language. This importance has been more and more acknowledged within the last ten years; and the evidence of papyri and ostraca takes a prominent place in Professor J. Hope Moulton's Prolegomena and his forthcoming Grammar of New Testament Greek. We are accustomed to the thought that at the time of the early diffusion of Christianity there was a universal language, the "common dialect" of Greek, prevalent throughout the Mediterranean East; and that the Gospel had of necessity to pass out of its primitive Aramaic phase—to become a world-religion it was imperative that Christianity should speak the language of the world. Now, when the man who spoke the "common" Greek proceeded to write it, he wrote better than he spoke; the literary remains of this Greek show a desire to lift it out of dialect-forms by recurrence to Attic models, and so the "talk," the popular colloquial language, was unrepresented by documents. For want of such specimens with which to compare it (so Deissmann urges), the language of the New Testament was left isolated, a strange and singular linguistic phenomenon. To the schoolboy it is merely easy Greek. By generations of scholars it was held to be a special invention destined to be the vehicle of the Holy Spirit. Now, in presence of the new conditions of study afforded by the rubbish-heaps of Egypt, the language of the New Testament is pronounced to be a specimen of "the colloquial form of late Greek, and of the popular colloquial language in particular." An immediate result of the comparison which the papyri enable us to make of the New Testament with other remains of this colloquial language is the reduction of the number of forms and constructions which have hitherto been explained as Hebraisms. Though the Semitic foundation is visible through the Greek version, especially in the words of Jesus, many other characteristics of New Testament writing—e.g., the simplicity of sentence-construction—are shown by the evidence of contemporary popular texts to be not un-Greek. Further, the papyrus-texts open a new chapter in the study of the vocabulary of Paul,*—a study which prompts our author to repeat his affirmation (already made at length in his Bible Studies) that the letters of Paul are not literary; they are not epistles, not written for publication—but genuine familiar letters, intended simply for those to whom they were sent. "His letters differ from the simple papyrus letters of Egypt, not by being letters, but by being the letters of St. Paul." Deissmann carries this distinction further—into a classification of the New Testament writings. A brief summary of this will be found interesting by those who can neither apply his criteria nor wholly accept his judgment. At the beginning of Christianity, there stands neither book nor letter, but spirit and personality. Jesus of Nazareth was altogether non-literary; he relied entirely on the living word. Like his Master, the non-literary Paul did not make Christianity the religion of a book—it is still the religion not of the letter but of the spirit. When Christianity has to become literary its literature is, in the first stage, written for Christians, and essentially popular. Here

* "New Light on the New Testament from Records of the Græco-Roman Period." By Adolf Deissmann, Professor of New Testament Exegesis in the University of Heidelberg. Translated from the Author's MS. by Lionel R. M. Strachan. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 1907.)

belong the Gospels, "including the Gospel of St. John, which is far more popular than is generally allowed," the Acts of the Apostles, and that most genuine people's book, the Revelation of St. John; also the epistles of James, Peter, Jude, and I John, not genuine letters, but popular pamphlets addressed to the Christian public in the form of letters. The next stage is marked by the beginning of an artistic literature. In the Epistle to the Hebrews, we see "Christianity stretching its wings for the conquest of culture." The third stage is reached in the second century, when Christian literature is produced no longer for Christians but for the widest possible public, with a polemical and apologetic purpose; and the last, when, in the same century, the literary and non-literary inheritance from the preceding epoch is differentiated from contemporary writing, and gathered into a new sacred book, the New Testament, a canon and a standard. "And this is the point at which the evolution of Christianity to the religion of a Book sets in, its evolution to a Church with legal status, the evolution of dogma and theology on the great scale." From this point one is tempted to turn back to sentences in which Deissmann, after showing that the evidence of language stamps the New Testament as a Book of the People, expounds the significance of the phrase:—

"Time has transformed the Book of the People into the Book of Humanity. From the philological point of view it can be seen that the two ideas stand in causal relation. Because the New Testament came from the unexhausted forces below and not from the feeble, resigned culture of a worn-out upper class, for this reason alone was it able to become the Book of Humanity."

"Thus from the simple writing on stone, papyrus, and clay that unfold to us the nature of the language of the New Testament, and at the same time reveal the peculiar characteristic of the Book, there streams a flood of light on the fate of the Sacred Volume in the history of the world: the New Testament became the Book of the Peoples because it was first the Book of the People."

We have omitted to quote illustrations of the manner in which the words and terms found in the papyri and ostraca throw light upon many details of New Testament vocabulary, really for fear of leaving the impression that this is a book intended mainly for readers of the Greek text; whereas there is hardly a page in it which will not be found interesting and instructive by every reader of the Gospels and Epistles. But what sort of "new light" is to be gained by the student of New Testament words and ideas from the recent researches may be seen from the following paragraph:—

"The following are but a few of the religious conceptions for the history of which we have gained important new material from the 'inscriptions,' 'papyri,' &c., namely, 'God,' 'Lord,' 'The Most High,' 'The Son of God,' 'The Saviour,' 'The Creator,' 'prophet,' 'ministration,' 'priest,' 'bishop,' 'virtue,' 'manner of life,' 'debt,' 'propitiation,' &c."

The few illustrative details given in this connection make the reader wish for more.

THE WHITE MAN'S WORK.*

PRIZE essays at the best are to be valued rather for the promise they may contain of future competence than as really serious contributions to the subject which they discuss. But Mr. Alston has qualifications which entitle him to a more respectful hearing. He did not take up the problem of racial antagonisms for the sake of the prize; but having spent the greater part of his life in British dominions beyond the sea has had practical experience of the relations existing between races of different colour, and writes from a knowledge not obtainable from books alone.

And, indeed, the problem is of far greater than literary or scientific interest, and the solution of it will probably be the greatest task laid upon the new century. Negroes, Hindus, Chinese—do they differ radically from Europeans and each other so that there can never be a common civilisation and similar modes of thought all the world over? or are the immense differences between us the result only of different environments which will disappear with the continually freer communication between all parts of the globe and the assimilation of the conditions of life and the growth of knowledge?

Which of these alternatives is in accordance with the facts remains yet, according to our author, an insoluble problem. His conclusion is a safe and wise one. We cannot postpone action until we have reached a certainty:—"It is our reasonable duty, therefore, so to plan out our general policy that, whichever theory be true, we shall have wrought in our day and generation as little mischief as possible." For mischief we have done abundantly, and are perpetrating still on a large scale and small, and much of it with good intentions, all of it probably under fair pretences.

But, first of all, it is necessary that we should know what it is we want to do otherwise than merely to exploit the coloured races and benefit at their cost. What are the higher ideals of civilisation and religion by which we desire to benefit them? It is not a question which admits of a ready answer, and, unfortunately, whatever be the nobility and beauty of the ideal we profess to uphold, the factors most in evidence in the progress of the Western world are, in principle, diametrically opposed to it.

"Repulsive self-assertion, reliance on material force, the exaltation of mere wealth, the disappearance of all self-respecting serenity in a 'cupiduous ravishment of the future,' the all-pervading ambition not of filling more completely the place in which each man is set by birth and circumstance, but of climbing by any and every means into some other which will be more lucrative—these are, probably, the characteristics which the thoughtful East associates more especially with the civilisation of Europe. Even in the missionary they observe signs of his being at heart inclined to accept a robber, less idealistic code than he officially upholds."

This being so, what seems to be wanted, in the first instance, is such a restatement

of the Christian ideal as will make it really conformable to what we in our hearts believe to be our highest and best in life. And, moreover, we need some kind of consensus as to what are the essential doctrines of Christianity. But this is, we believe, unattainable. If it be the fact that "until we get a clear-cut body of doctrine which our ablest teachers can accept, and be found willing to devote themselves to propagating abroad, the nominal, superficial progress of Christianity, in countries like India, is likely to remain disappointingly slight," then we can understand how slight is the apparent progress of the churches which resolutely disclaim any such "clear-cut body of doctrine."

We are inclined to think that the problem which the author discusses, with great fairness and ability, is one which will be solved only by time. Will the West prevail to leaven the East with its ethical and religious ideas? Will the East maintain the mental seclusion in which it has so long lived, in spite of an ever freer intercourse with the Anglo-Saxon race? Will there, eventually, emerge from the union of the two some new and higher civilisation? Those who know the most cannot answer these questions, for they have learnt by long experience how impossible it is to understand the mind of an alien race. Shall we ever get nearer to our fellow subjects in India, in Africa, in Canada, than we have yet done? At any rate, we can do our best in the spirit of the charity which "hopeth all things and boasteth not itself, vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up."

C. H.

NIGHT.

WE often hear it stated as a fact that certain things could never be known or even exist apart from their opposites; for example, that good could not exist without evil, pleasure without pain, harmony without discord, light without darkness. Whether this is so or not I am not prepared to say. But, confining attention for the moment to the last point—light and darkness—whether or not without the night we could ever have the day, this at least seems certain, that if there were no night we should never have known the wonders revealed by the starry heavens; we should never have had a science of astronomy. This thought is nowhere more beautifully expressed than in Blanco White's sonnet on "Night and Death," which has been described as the finest sonnet in our language.

"Mysterious Night! when our first parent knew

Thee from report divine, and heard thy name,

Did he not tremble for this lovely frame,
This glorious canopy of light and blue?
Yet 'neath a curtain of translucent dew,
Bathed in the rays of the great setting flame,

Hesperus with the host of heaven came,
And lo! creation widened in man's view.

Who could have thought such darkness lay concealed

Within thy beams, O Sun! or who could find,

Whilst fly and leaf and insect stood revealed,

That to such countless orbs thou mad'st us blind!

Why do we then shun death with anxious strife?

If Light can thus deceive, wherefore not Life?"

And, to touch a still deeper and more spiritual note, we may quote in this connection a passage from one of the immortal sermons of F. W. Robertson ("Jacob's Wrestling") :—"There is a sense in which darkness has more of God than light has. He is approached more nearly in that which is indefinite than in that which is definite and distinct. He is felt in awe, and wonder, and worship, rather than in clear conceptions. Moments of tender, vague mystery often bring distinctly the feeling of His presence. When day breaks and distinctness comes the Divine has evaporated from the soul like morning dew. It is true, even literally, that the darkness reveals God. Every morning God draws the curtain of the garish light across His eternity, and we lose the Infinite. We look down on earth instead of up to heaven, on a narrower and more contracted spectacle—that which is examined by the microscope when the telescope is laid aside—smallness, instead of vastness. 'Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labour until the evening;' and in the dust and pettiness of life we seem to cease to behold Him; then at night He undraws the curtain again and we see how much of God and Eternity the bright and distinct day has hidden from us."

The beauty, the calm, the magical influence, the restorative power of the night are felt in some degree by all, and beautiful passages without number in our literature attest what a source of inspiration the night and the starry heavens have been. But perhaps of all the feelings evoked by the night and the stars, especially to those doomed to endure the rush and turmoil of the great city, the chief is that of calm. Goethe has the fine saying, "Like a star, without haste, yet without rest, let each one revolve round his own task."

The same feeling of the calming influence exercised by the night is expressed in Longfellow's lines :—

"O holy Night, by thee we learn to bear

What man has borne before,

Thou layest thy finger on the lips of Care,
And they complain no more."

Emerson says : "If a man would be alone, let him look at the stars. One might think the atmosphere was made transparent with this design, to give man, in the heavenly bodies, the perpetual presence of the sublime. If the stars should appear one night in a thousand years, how would man believe and adore, and preserve for many generations the remembrance of the city of God, which had been shown! But every night come out the envoys of beauty, and light the universe with their admonishing smile."

The necessary demands of sleep, combined with the natural sluggishness of our nature, sadly hinder us from taking advantage of what the night has to give us. A hasty and casual glance is all that is usually gained. The real way to experience the wonder and beauty of the night is to indulge the habit practised by enthusiasts of the "open-air" system of "sleeping out"; only you must not, of course, sleep too well. The writer had a wonderful experience of this sleeping out on one or two of the nights of the beautiful summer of last year, and can strongly recommend the experiment, if not from a sanatory or pleasurable, at least from an astronomical, point of view. Instead of a momentary glance from the street or some place where the star-gazer attracts attention, reclining in comfort on your camp-bed or mattress, and screened from view, you can take a long steady gaze upon these pure and radiant orbs. You witness the grand and stately march of the constellations, hour by hour, over the vault above you; familiar friends, usually seen only on winter nights, greet your sight; gazing intently, you seem to feel the influence of the stars sinking into you; and then long before you expect it, the dawn begins, the loveliest sight of all; light summer clouds in the east catch the golden glow of the sunrise long before the monarch himself appears, and the varying forms of cloud and constant change of hue and colour exhibit a scene of varying beauty that no words could adequately paint.

"Morn in the white wake of the morning star Came furrowing all the orient into gold."

Then the stars gradually pale, the lesser lights going first, till two or three of the giants only are left; and at last the morning star—a brother or sister planet—alone remains, sole herald of the approach of their mighty sire, the Sun.

And then how refreshing is the stillness of the night, what Milton beautifully calls "the soft silence of the list'ning night." And in this connection my experience of sleeping out revealed the curious fact that the silence was far greater in London than in the country. In my Hampstead garden, within four miles of Charing-cross, the stillness was almost perfect, while in the country one heard the crowing of cocks, the barking of dogs, the lowing of cattle, and other rural noises.

It is strange to contemplate our subject as affecting the denizens of worlds (if such there be) illuminated by two, three, or even four suns, for such systems are known to exist. It would seem that the inhabitants of such worlds would never have sight of "that majestic roof, fretted with golden fire," and perhaps would know not sleep. For them would be realised the ideal of the writer of the Book of Revelations of a world of which it could be said "There shall be no night there." This, however, in view of what we have said of the night, were hardly "a consummation devoutly to be wished."

Gazing upon the sky, whether by night or day, what—from a scientific point of view—a beautiful "illusion" it all is. We feel the force of Tom Hood's lines, referring to the fir-trees viewed with childish eyes :—

"I used to think their slender tops

Were close against the sky."

Wordsworth sings :—

"My heart leaps up when I behold

A rainbow in the sky."

Dr. Watts likens the twinkling star to "a diamond in the sky."

Formerly the belief was universal that the sky was a solid, concave vault or dome, resting on the earth at the horizon.

In this solid dome, according to this belief, there were windows or doors, by the opening of which the rain was poured out on the earth from reservoirs which were on the upper side of the dome. In this vault the stars were supposed to be stuck. The ancient Greeks make their sun-god drive his sun-chariot over this vault daily from east to west. Omar Khayyam speaks of it as "that inverted bowl they call the sky."

Although modern science has corrected all this, the old ideas still cling to us. It is difficult to realise, but it is nevertheless the fact, that the rainbow is not really "in the sky"; nor have the stars any connection with the blue vault. In fact, the sky is an absolute illusion. There is no sky. "This brave o'erhanging firmament, this majestical roof," this immortal bowl, this vault, this dome, has no real existence. No, we are not hemmed in, as our gross senses would have us believe. Our terrestrial windows are open, and we look right through into the Infinite.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THERE are several articles in the Contemporary for October of special interest to religious thinkers. Professor Ramsay, in "Paulinism in the Græco-Roman World," discusses how Paul's thought grew out of Hellenism, how it was related to Judaism and to the Roman Imperial system. Paul was penetrated by the idea that everything is in a process of growth, and the essence of his teaching lies in the education of the intellect and the character. Official Christianity, under the emperors, became victorious, and Pauline Christianity disappeared from the world for a time, and only revived when freedom of thought and life began to stir in Europe. The Protestants of the Reformation were guided and stimulated by the teachings of Paul.

Mr. Addis, of Manchester College, after examining the evidence and giving a brief summary of the varied and conflicting views upon marriage held by the early Hebrews, answers the question—Is marriage with a deceased wife's sister forbidden in Scripture?—in the negative. The testimony of the New Testament is also considered as quite inconclusive. Mr. J. E. C. de Montmorency criticises the action of the bishops and clergy who are attempting to take refuge in the Canon Law. He advises the Church to reserve her forces for great issues, and not "fritter away her strength in a cause that has no ultimate merits."

Among the articles dealing with politics, the first place is given to a defence of the Second Duma by Professor Milyoukov. Mr. William O'Brien, in "Ireland and the Transvaal," expresses the belief that in a few years hence it will be discovered that human nature is not one whit more irredeemable in Ireland than in the Transvaal, or even in the palace of the Tsar.

The literary supplement is a new feature in the Contemporary. The reviews and notices of books are introduced by a brief paper by Mr. Birrell on "The Critical Faculty." The conclusion reached is that reviewing requires not only knowledge and sympathy, but also sanity. "Let sanity for ever sit enthroned in the critic's arm-chair." Dr. Dillon's comments on Foreign Affairs have too much of an anti-German tone; if knowledge abounds, sympathy and sanity do not hold too prominent a place in some of his comments.

In the Nineteenth Century and After there is a great variety of articles. The Duke of Argyll contributes one on "Fair Farms versus Fancy Crofts" which makes one despair of a great landlord approaching land reform in a reasonable spirit. Class and political bias are evident in every page. The defects and shortcomings of the Crofters Act are well known in Scotland, but that the assistance of landowners and farmers by agricultural loans would prove an effectual remedy for the evils described by the Duke is open to grave doubt.

Mr. Harold Cox, in describing "The Swiss Army," discusses the wisdom and necessity of compulsory military service in England, and declares against it. He thinks it very mischievous to teach that military service is the only service which a man owes to his country. Civic duty involves the possibility of having to take part in warfare, but it includes much more.

Bishop Welldon, in claiming that the evidence in support of the authenticity of the New Testament is superior to the evidence by which the most famous works of classical antiquity are accredited, does not carry us very far in the direction of traditional views of Biblical inspiration and infallibility. It will amuse the higher critics that the Bishop excepts only 2 Peter from the list of authentic writings.

Those of our readers who have recently been in America will find the articles on Sunday newspapers in the States and political corruption in Canada of special interest. There is a valuable literary paper dealing with recent French fiction. A gloomy and forbidding picture of the ordinary French novel is presented by Madame de Longgarde.

The Albany Review contains short articles dealing chiefly with social problems, some of them too short to allow anything like full discussion. Lady Bell, in "Our Present Vocabulary," condemns the use of new-fangled and vulgar expressions. She pleads that not only should we do our best, but also say our best.

In the Cornhill Magazine, in addition to its continued stories, there are readable articles on such varied topics as "Trapping Bear," "Uganda Housekeeping," a recollection of Herbert Spencer, and a Botanical Legend. Mr. Arthur C. Benson discourses on Humour, which he holds is "a kind of divine and crowning grace in a character, because it means an artistic sense of proportion, a true and vital tolerance, a power of infinite forgiveness."

A PUBLIC lecture will be given at Bedford College on Thursday, November 28, at 5.15 p.m., by Walter Leaf, Esq., Litt.D., on "Some Impressions of Persian Poetry." Cards of admission are not required.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE WHITE LILAC.

WHEN I was in Spain I lodged for some months in the house of an elderly person, by name Don Esparto. Tall, stiff, and stately, with long, thin face, heavy moustache and scanty grey hair, I always thought of him as Don Quixote. In fact, on more occasions than one I scarcely prevented my tongue from tripping and calling him by the name of that distinguished knight. Even had I been betrayed by thoughtlessness into this act of discourtesy I scarcely think it would have interrupted our agreeable relationship, for he was a man of great reserve and self-possession, and, though he said so little, had evidently seen so much of life and by fortitude got through so many hardships and troubles that he was not easily disconcerted. Indeed, he was one of those men who, having gone the round of fortune, is always prepared for a turn of the wheel either this way or that, and, by his admirable self-mastery, seemed to gain an inch in dignity with every event in his career. Sometimes, when we were both disinclined for any other occupation, he would entertain me by the recital of what he was pleased to call a fable, such as the following:—

I once had a neighbour, said he, who fell into debt. He was the owner of a lead mine in the mountains which, at one time, had yielded a very rich return, so that his family became affluent. They were open-handed, and spent their fortune as it came into their hands. The head of the family, however, was a man of refined tastes, and spent a large amount both of his time and money in his garden, which was separated from my own only by a low hedge. I was thus enabled to enjoy almost as much as he did himself the succession of beautiful flowers which were the reward of his care and skill. Lilies of every variety, white, yellow, orange, and purple, displayed their banners of bloom, and then gave place to other species. A well-arranged grotto of rock-work was covered with a profusion of ferns and orchids. A large part of the garden was laid out as a rosery, where the finest roses grown held their court and emitted a mingled perfume which surpassed anything of the kind I have ever known. But in spite of all these delights of beauty, the pride of the garden was a group of white lilac bushes. An unusually fine quality to begin with, the soil proved exactly adapted to them, so that they flourished beyond ordinary measure and formed a conspicuous thicket on one side of the garden, whose foliage of large, smooth, heart-shaped leaves formed an agreeable contrast to the rich tapestry of flowers spread over the rest of the plot. But it was in its clusters of blossom that the special distinction of the lilac lay. Year after year the summer received its bridal welcome in the pile of sweet-scented, snowy trusses which covered and hid every bough. No one who ever saw it—and all were welcome who wished to—but afterwards looked forward to the next summer as an opportunity to renew their delight.

But I have mentioned, Don Esparto continued, that my neighbour fell into debt. The lead mine ceased to yield any metal. For several years it was worked at a heavy loss in the hope that a fresh vein might be struck, but to no effect. The owner found himself bankrupt, a ruined man. To pay off a portion of his debts he sold all his possessions, including his garden, which was bought by a man of precisely opposite disposition. He took not the slightest interest in its beauty, though he had often seen it at its best. He was an onion-grower, and he looked upon the piece of ground solely from the point of view of the quantity of onions it would produce for market. He measured the extent of the garden with his eye. I saw him standing there one day, just inside the gate, casting a cold, calculating glance up and down. This soil, said he to himself, is of the best. For years it has been annually enriched with plenty of the best manure. It has been continually turned over and over and exposed to the air and sunshine as an expert cook turns and handles her pastry to make it light. I will buy it at all costs and plant it with onions, for it will soon yield me a handsome profit. One difficulty arose. Although thrifty to the point of meanness his savings did not amount to the price asked by the owner. This, however, was soon overcome, for a loan from a dealer for which he offered to pay a good rate of interest, and pledged his horse and cart if he failed to repay the loan in two years, made him master of the situation.

It was winter time when he took possession. For this circumstance, said my friend, I felt grateful. The ruthlessness of his attack upon the plants was not quite so evident as it would have been had they all been in bloom at the time; for, assisted by another man, he cleared the garden from end to end, and calculating that his time spent there was worth more just then than by attempting to sell the plants piecemeal, he piled them in the centre of the ground and made a bonfire of them. Last of all he came to the white lilac. I heard him giving directions to his man to cut the bushes down and grub up the roots. Looking over the hedge I ventured to put in a word to save them, reminding him of their acknowledged beauty. "I have no eye for that sort of thing," said he. "They take up a lot of room; I shall grow three bushels of onions where they stand; besides, the branches will do for bean-poles—I shall get a score of them." Somewhat to my surprise he offered to let me have a root or two if I gave him as many bean-sticks as they had branches, which bargain I readily agreed to; but it was of little avail. The trees were old and deep-rooted, and little care was shown in taking them up. When replanted in my garden they threw out a poor effort of blossom the following spring, but the dryness and heat of the summer killed them.

This happened, said Don Esparto, twenty years ago. The onion-grower prospered. His first crop enabled him to repay the loan. He is now a rich man and has been mayor of the town. The original owner of the garden is still living in a neighbouring village. He stuck to his mine, and by hard work and economy has managed to keep on his feet and pay his debts. He is a kind-hearted fellow with a cheery word and a helping hand for everyone. He has written a story which he calls "White Magic," which was suggested by his own lilac bushes. You must read it; I will lend it to you.

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

THE work of the Second Peace Conference closed on Saturday last, October 19. The Times correspondent sums up its results as consisting of "Thirteen conventions, two declarations, one resolution, five vœux, and a recommendation." In a leader headed "The Hague Fiasco" the Times says: "The second Hague Conference is dead and buried, and, as sometimes happens, the funeral orations, composedly delivered over the august corpse, sound in the ears of the onlookers like a mockery of the deceased. 'A veritable monument,' we are asked to believe, 'has been raised to Right, Justice, and the Spirit of Peace and International Concord.' It is, as the mourners who yesterday stood decorously about it well know, a whited sepulchre, within full of dead men's bones and of all uncleanness. Can there be a stranger or more instructive contrast than the contrast between the programme of this assemblage and its achievements; unless, indeed, it be the contrast between the professions of its members and their acts?"

This seems to us a very prejudiced and ill-natured criticism. It sounds to us like the criticism of men who not only disbelieve in the Hague Conference, but of men who do not really wish it to succeed.

It is not the criticism of a disillusioned idealist, desiring intensely that some steps towards international peace may be attained by these Conferences, and bitterly disappointed because so little has been done. We could understand many people feeling this, but in the Times criticism there is a note of triumphant, almost of savage joy at the failures of the Conference. It is hardly a correct account to speak of it as "dead and buried." The Conference has come to an end, of course, as it was bound to do after long months of labour, whether successful or unsuccessful. There is nothing humiliating or indicative of total failure in the fact that its deliberations are over, and that its members have returned to their own homes. Neither is there anything necessarily hypocritical in the sentiments of humanity expressed by its members, even though those sentiments have not embodied themselves in definite enactments. Man may quite honestly cherish and express ideals which at the moment do not seem to them practicable, without being hypocrites. Indeed it is only through the cherishing and reiteration of such ideals that they slowly become practicable.

We do, however, feel much regret at some of the failures of the Conference. We regret that through the action of Germany no agreement was found possible on the subject of marine mines. The laying of these terrible engines of destruction in the high seas during war threatens sudden destruction to neutral shipping, and seems to us absolutely unjustifiable.

We regret, equally, the refusal of Great Britain to guarantee the safety of non-combatant ships not carrying "contraband of war." Our naval experts seem to be agreed that in accepting this proposal we should forego a great advantage. It ought also to be remembered that we should escape a great danger. We depend far more on our own non-combatant shipping for supplies than any other nation upon theirs. Hostile cruisers could injure us much more by capturing our merchantmen than we could injure them. But apart from questions of expediency we deeply regret that Great Britain would not accept the principle of leaving non-combatants, as far as possible, alone.

One of the great dangers of such a conference of the nations as that held at the Hague is that each nation is inclined to lay the blame for not having achieved more upon some other nation.

If it had not been for the selfishness and suspicion of this or that representative much more could have been done. We were quite willing but were prevented by others. When our newspapers indulge in this kind of Pharisaism it would be well for them to remember that one important measure of reform, at any rate, was prevented mainly by the action of Great Britain.

We do not think that any real lover of peace ought to be discouraged by the Hague Conference. You cannot expect representatives to represent anything more than what is considered safe and advisable by the average opinion of their own nation. The average opinion of Great Britain, at the present time, regards elaborate and expensive armaments as absolutely necessary, and it regards war in some circumstances as inevitable. There is probably a greater dislike of the danger and the cost of war than formerly. The ever-increasing burdens of preparation for war lie heavy upon us, and we would fain escape them if we could. But it is really to the credit of human nature that these arguments from expediency against war count for very little against patriotism and against the determination, at all costs, to maintain our empire and our position amongst the nations. We do not like spending so much money or risking so many lives, but in comparison with national independence it is of very small account.

The desire for peace must be something very much more than a desire for saving men or money if international harmony is to be attained. The feeling of the wickedness of war must be stronger than the feeling of its stupidity. You can never abolish bad things merely by proving they are foolish. Bad things can only be abolished when they are felt to be bad.

We believe that this sense of the evil of war is growing among the nations, and we should not be in the least discouraged even though the Hague Conference had done nothing at all. There is a famous saying of JOHN STUART MILL that small remedies for great diseases do not produce small results; they produce no results.

The feeling against war is not yet strong enough to make much impression in the councils of the nations, but it is a growing feeling, and it will have to be reckoned with. What are regarded as the mere pious sentiments and desires of one Conference may become the acts of another. It needs only that there should be a settled body of convinced supporters behind. Peace-lovers must turn once again from International Conferences to their own definite work at home. They have to convince men not only of the folly but of the wickedness of war. If the representatives came together from nations which think war at its best a hateful necessity, not merely a stupid blunder, there would be small difficulty in obtaining great reforms.

Everyone who believes in the goodness of human nature and in the progress of the world must feel certain that war is bound to go. But it will decay and disappear not by dextrous rearrangements of methods by selfish units, but by a moral and religious enthusiasm for peace which will make nations as well as men ready to suffer loss if need be on behalf of their convictions and their love. We have to see to it that our representatives at the next Hague Conference shall represent a people which seeks peace and pursues it, and which is determined to do something to lessen not only the horrors but the likelihood of war.

THE practical and great consideration is not how much can I do, but how much will I do of what I can?—W. C. Gannett.

THERE are those who acquire the habit of helping others, of comforting, of adding cheerfulness and strength wherever they go. To those who thus give much is given in return—contentment, trust in God, confidence in their fellow-men, sweet hopes, peaceful memories.—James Freeman Clarke.

THE COMPASSION OF JESUS FOR THE MULTITUDE.

(Spoken at Little Portland-street Chapel concerning the Sunday Evening Gatherings at the Euston Theatre.)

When Jesus saw the multitudes, he was moved with compassion towards them because they fainted and were scattered abroad, as sheep having no shepherd; and he began to teach them many things.—MATT. and MARK.

FIFTY years ago—let me be personal for once—fifty years ago, when I became minister to the poor in Birmingham and “The Black Country,” these words haunted me, and they have haunted me ever since. This accounts for my very frequent launchings out from the haven of church or chapel wherever I have lived; and a vivid response from the shepherdless has never failed me.

I have always felt that the pleasant and necessary Unitarian cage does not suffice, and that, whosoever fault it may be, it does not bring in those for whom Jesus seemed to care the most. What did he say? “I came not to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance”; “Come unto me, all ye that are tired and heavy laden, and I will give you rest”; “They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick”; “The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to give relief to them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord”; “The son of man is come to seek and to save that which has gone astray.” In all these sayings we get at the real Jesus—the lover of the toiler, the friend of the unreckoned, the champion of the poor; and I hold as strongly as ever that the Unitarian, if he only knew it and believed it, is, in these modern days, the very man for the people that interested Jesus.

The churchless multitude is not a vicious multitude, is not even specially a careless multitude; but it is a shepherdless multitude, a multitude which is dimly persuaded that church and chapel are not for them. To a large extent, that is the multitude's mistake, but it is the fact, and it is not altogether without reason.

Now, what I have long advocated is that Unitarians ought to go out to that multitude. It is not enough, it is not their duty, to keep altogether in their cage. Every Unitarian minister who, on Sunday mornings, has ministered to his flock ought to go out in the evening to challenge the unshepherded. Anywhere will do—the theatre, the public hall, a railway arch, a quiet street—but out he ought to go, and his congregation ought to go with him; and the more courageous and prominent the challenge the likelier will be the success.

It is quite arguable that for the Unitarian Church itself this is what it most needs—to vary its routine, to break up its conventionality, to give it animation, to make it truly democratic, and to fire it with a desire to serve. This might cost a little money, but what a trivial matter that is when we consider what Unitarians have, and what the majority of them give!

It is true that this going forth to the unshepherded would probably bring but few of them into the Unitarian fold, but what of that? If our ideals are as broad and lofty as we often profess, we shall not mind doing good for the good's sake, and shall not risk missing the unshepherded multitude for the sake of a name and a flag.

Now, it is not to be denied that in some respects the Unitarian Church of the past has not been as actively obedient here as it might have been; and yet it almost taught other Churches how to found Domestic Missions, and has always done good work in that direction. But it has much to learn and much to do. If it only knew it, it has the very message the multitude needs. It has, in fact, in its charge the great Religion of the future—the Religion of Humanity, the Religion which will ultimately bring to an end the Religions of priesthoods, sects, and creeds. Other Churches will swiftly learn the secret of that Religion of Humanity, but thus far it is best understood and most simply set forth by ourselves. We have indeed a Gospel, what the revised version, in this very text, calls “good tidings,” and I am persuaded that if we could get that Gospel put before the masses in a human, earnest, sympathetic manner, it would be responded to in a way that none of us have yet dreamed of; for it is all so absolutely in harmony with everything that is best and truest in human nature and in the heart's unsullied hope and trust in God.

And now recall the significant concluding words of my text—“and he began to teach them many things.” That is, when he had compassion on the scattered multitude, as sheep having no shepherd, he began to teach them “many things”—a wonderful suggestion for us! As a rule the Churches teach only a few things—Protestant things, Roman Catholic things, Trinitarian things, Unitarian things. Oh the pity of it! But the multitude needs teaching about life, about work and home, comradeship and kindness, about husbands and wives, and brothers and sisters, and little children, and the great universal Brotherhood which is going to make an end of selfishness and grasping and tyranny and war.

Ah! let us go out with the “many things” and meet this great hungry human nature with its cravings and wonderings, its stumblings and waste. Let us comfort it, encourage it, and lead it if we can. At all events, let us try. The brother Jesus, of whom we talk so much and imitate so little, has shown us all the way.

J. PAGE HOPPS.

It is fifty years since the Adult School movement reached York, and the fact has not been allowed to pass unnoted. Some 2,200 persons were entertained at tea in the Exhibition Buildings by the widow of the founder, the late Mr. J. Stephenson Rowntree, and large meetings were subsequently held in the same building, in the Theatre Royal, and, on Sunday, 13th, in the Friends' Meeting House. Among the speakers who bore witness to the practical work done by the schools in the old cathedral city were Canon Fleming, Mr. Joseph Rowntree, Mr. B. Seebohm Rowntree, the Lord Mayor and the Sheriff. The singing at the evening meeting was led by an Adult School choir of 1,500 voices.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A MEETING of the Committee was held at Manchester College, Oxford, on Tuesday, the 15th inst., the president in the chair. Fifteen members were present, and apologies for absence from seventeen others were announced.

The following resolution was passed on the death of Mr. A. W. Worthington:—

“That this Committee, meeting for the first time since the death of Mr. A. W. Worthington, desires to place on record its grateful sense of the valuable services rendered by him during a long life to the churches which constitute the National Conference. Mr. Worthington was intimately associated with the Conference from its establishment to the day of his death, having been one of its original hon. secretaries for twenty-three years, and subsequently a vice-president. The zeal and solicitude which he always manifested for the Conference and for its earliest offspring—the Ministers' Sustentation Fund, of which also he was one of the hon. secretaries—are but conspicuous instances of his devotion to the welfare of the churches with which he was connected.

The Committee, deeply sensible of its own loss of an honoured colleague, desires to offer its sincere sympathy with those who have suffered bereavement in the closer relations of family life.”

A letter was read from the Executive Committee of the International Conference, which was preparing for the meetings in Boston a collection of “the creeds, confessions, declarations of belief, principle or purpose, and other articles of association, which are in use in the various congregations, societies, churches, denominations, and other forms of fellowship connected with the Congress.” The reply of the secretary was approved, in which he stated that the National Conference “has no creed, confession, declaration of belief or obligatory ceremony of any kind, and particularly rejoices in its freedom from such fetters on the spontaneous development of religious thought and life,” and gave information about the basis of our fellowship.

The Treasurer submitted his report. It was agreed that a further endeavour should be made to reach congregations which have not so far responded to the appeal for contributions to the working expenses of the Conference.

Arrangements were approved with regard to the travelling expenses of members of the Committee.

The President gave an interesting and vivid account, which greatly impressed the Committee, of his visit to congregations in the eastern counties. Mr. Wood was to visit East Cheshire in October, and London and the south-eastern counties in November. Other districts will be visited in the spring.

The report of the Sub-Committee re Advisory Committees, &c., was received, and the first portion, reciting what had been done, was approved. But a decision with regard to the definite proposals submitted was postponed, in order that the sub-committee might be able to make further inquiries and reconsider some of the recommendations.

It was resolved to set up forthwith the Board, whose establishment had been previously agreed upon, relating to the supply of students for the ministry. The Revs. H. E. Dowson, C. J. Street, and Messrs. Jno. Harrison, W. Byng Kenrick, F. W. Monks and P. J. Worsley (with the president and secretary as ex-officio members) were appointed representatives of the Conference on the Board.

It was agreed that the next meeting of the Committee be held in Manchester, in January, at 2 o'clock on the day of the annual meeting of the Home Missionary College.

THE NEW DURNING HALL, LIMEHOUSE.

OPENING CEREMONY.

By the courtesy of the editor of the Christian Life, we are enabled to give the following account of the opening of the new buildings. "The new building, erected by Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence, to meet the growing requirements of the Unitarian Christian Mission Church in Elsa-street, was opened on Thursday evening, the 17th inst., with very little formality, but amid every manifestation of enthusiasm and rejoicing. Our readers will remember that this flourishing Unitarian Mission celebrated its twenty-first anniversary in March of last year, and in describing the gathering on that occasion, we remarked that the hall "was crowded with men, women and children, upon whose radiant faces, and neat and cleanly appearance generally, as contrasted with the squalid environment outside, the beneficent influence of the Mission was markedly visible." The same observation applies to last week's gathering in connection with the opening of the spacious new hall, which forms a much-needed additional accommodation to the old building—only that the crowd on this occasion was twice, if not three times, as large as that on the twenty-first anniversary. What with a strong muster of the Mission people, Sunday-school scholars, teachers, and workers in various branches of the institution, two brass bands, and a choir, as well as no inconsiderable number of visitors from all parts of London, the scene was indeed one of delightful animation, such as to make one and all feel "glad to be there."

"Light refreshments having been dispensed in the old hall, whilst the Town Band was discoursing a selection of music on the ground floor—and that part of the new premises, comprising gymnasium, kitchen, bath-room, and such like having been inspected, criticised, and admired by the visitors—the company proceeded to the new hall, which had been gaily decorated with flowers and bunting.

"Of course, the chair was taken by Sir Edwin, and with him on the platform was Lady Durning-Lawrence, Rev. John Toye (the minister in charge), Mr. Burgoyne, Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, Frank K. Freeston, Charles Roper, B.A., F. Allen, T. E. M. Edwards, and F. Summers, Mr. Arnold S. Tayler, A.R.I.B.A. (the architect), Mrs. Aspland, Miss Emily Sharpe, Miss Tayler, and other well-known ladies and gentlemen."

"Sir EDWIN DURNING-LAWRENCE, Bart., on rising to declare the hall open, was received with prolonged applause. "This new Durning Hall is yours," he said.

"It is built for you. I want all in this neighbourhood to feel that it is theirs." Continuing, Sir Edwin said that when they first came down to that neighbourhood to open their mission hall, about twenty-five years ago, people told them that they would not have one pane of glass left in the building after a few weeks. That prediction had proved entirely false. In all those years he did not think that a single pane of glass had been broken at Durning Hall. For the people soon realised that the institute was their own—that it was built for their own benefit, for their happiness, comfort, health, and general improvement. Therefore they took particular interest in it, and looked after it as their own property. Sir Edwin briefly told of the steps taken two or three years ago to enlarge the premises in order to extend the usefulness of the institution. He had been fortunate to secure some of the adjoining premises, and had tried to buy up the "place next door" (an allusion the significance of which the audience were by no means slow to grasp), but had found it impossible to do so. He hoped, however, that the additional accommodation afforded by this enlargement would enable them to cope with present requirements. Although he did not visit them himself as often as he would like, Lady Durning-Lawrence and Miss Shawcross were frequently there, and they wanted them in that place to work together in a friendly and harmonious spirit of mutual helpfulness and goodwill. Let them remember that they, the people, were really the building. The church did not mean the four walls, but it meant the men and women who came together for common worship and common service. That new hall was to be a real people's palace—it was not too compact and not too handsome, but just compact and handsome enough. It was nice and airy, but not draughty. It was designed to make them happy and to feel quite at home. But they could not have comfort all round unless each was prepared to study the happiness of all. They came to that hall, then, to learn to be better men and women. Spurgeon had once said that he knew a certain servant girl to be a true Christian because she swept under the mats. So they came there to learn to be thorough—to learn to clean the corners and sweep under the mats. It was a trait in our English character that we tried to be straight and speak the truth. And it was always easier to tell the truth than to tell a lie. The trouble in telling a lie was that you had to keep it up. Now, looking back over the twenty-one years since the first opening of Durning Hall, he could see a great improvement in the character of the people of that neighbourhood. They were still improving, and he wanted to help them. That was the object which Mr. Toye had in working among them. That was the object for which that new hall had been built. He wanted to make them more truthful. He wanted to make them stronger. He believed in strong characters. He wished to help them to be happier, brighter, braver, truer, and stronger. For that purpose he declared the building open.

"Lady DURNING-LAWRENCE also addressed some encouraging and helpful words to the workers. She most heartily thanked the members of the Mothers' Meeting, the Sunday-school teachers, and Girls' Club for the great kindness and thoughtfulness of which the beautiful bouquet she held in her hand was an expression. "I dare say," proceeded her ladyship, "that a few of the mothers who sent a Christmas card to Miss Durning-Smith are among the audience to-night. I have got that card still, with your names on it." She again thanked them very much for the bouquet which she very highly prized because they had thought of it. Lady Durning-Lawrence then proceeded to distribute the presents to the workers in the Sunday-school and the various other branches of activity connected with the institution—about thirty-five in all. She observed that in that Mission they had a very good band of workers, under the guidance of Mr. Toye. There were many who came there regularly during the week, as well as on Sundays. Gratitude was thanks for past favours, but they wanted more favours to come, and she took that opportunity of appealing for still more helpers to assist Mr. Toye in the work of the Mission.

"Rev. FRANK K. FREESTON, in wishing success to the new building, voiced the sentiment uppermost in every heart that night of gratitude to the generous donors. Nor could they forget the lady whose name they held in sacred memory in that place—the late Miss J. Durning-Smith. It was right that they should remember her that night, though she would not be forgotten so long as that Mission lasted. In a speech bristling with wit and humour, but by no means devoid of wise thought and sound sense, Mr. Freeston congratulated the workers and all concerned on having that fine hall and the additional premises; he congratulated the architect and the builders upon the excellent character and arrangement of the new building, and he wished good health to Mr. and Mrs. Toye, and "all the other little Toyes." They had had Mr. Toye with them for over twenty-one years, but they loved him that night more than ever. "This," concluded the speaker, "shall be our people's palace. God bless it!"

"Rev. CHARLES ROPER added a few words of good counsel, cheer, and helpfulness to the people; and with a cordial vote of thanks to Sir Edwin a delightfully pleasant evening was brought to a close just before eleven o'clock."

A SMILE.

ONLY a smile and a kindly word,

But it was not given in vain:

For it soothed the wound of the one who heard,

And it eased the pain

Of a life that was sadly tempest-tossed;

And the faith of a soul that was nearly lost

By that was made strong again.—D. D.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIALISM.

SIR,—I read your leader on Christianity and Socialism with (to use an admirable phrase of your own) imperfect sympathy. When I opened my INQUIRER last week and saw the title, my heart gave a leap of joy, for at any rate our leading organ was discussing a really live subject. But I confess that my untimely rejoicing was swiftly chastened and indeed refined completely away as I read your pronouncement. What you actually say may be comparatively unobjectionable, but the spirit of it strikes me as one of strangely chill aloofness from what the Archdeacon of Ely calls "modern social ideals." Moreover, the strong emphasis with which you insist that "the Gospel of Jesus Christ must not be identified with any social theories, however beautiful, or any social methods, however good," seems to me amazingly misplaced. Even granting that the statement as worded is a truth, it is surely not the particular or fruitful truth that needs just now to be preached in the face of this anti-socialist campaign.

Nor do I think that your phrases "pure nonsense" and "silly talk" are at all adequate to describe the sinister and cynical character of the attempt which is now being made to secure the co-operation of the Christian Church in this apostolate of calumny.

I am not an exponent of Socialism. I do not call myself a Socialist, or recognise myself as such, but if, at the initiative of desperate politicians in a reckless search after a policy, we are to be classed as Socialists and Anti-Socialists, I for one shall not be found with the Anti-Socialists.

Permit me to describe what, in my opinion, is actually taking place. On the one hand, we see a deliberate, if disguised, attempt to unite the forces of wealth and privilege against the forces of labour and democracy. On the other hand, we see the workers and the disinherited awakening at last into a consciousness of their power, and demanding a just share in the fruits of that civilisation which is so largely the product of their skill and service. But between these two sections may be found a large number of people in fairly comfortable circumstances and (with notable exceptions), only vaguely interested in the pressing social problems of our time. This middle section, belonging to neither extreme, comprises many amiable and pleasant people, who are neither exploiters of the misery of the distressed nor ardent champions of their cause. Now here is a broad field of opportunity for the professional electioneer.

It is on capturing the sympathies of these estimable nondescripts and securing their support that the issue of the social struggle is deemed to depend. The Anti-Socialist agitators confidently reckon on this. The organisers of it have on their side choice and charming personalities, huge financial resources, and an accommodating and infinitely adaptable code of honour. There are among them those strong, stern men who do not put their trust in princes, but rely instead on gramophones. They are able to command the services of the type of men Mr. Graham Wallas described for us at Manchester College, Oxford, some time ago—men versed in human psychology, and skilled in the art of working up popular panics; expert journalists and clever cartoonists, who, by dint of unscrupulous articles and sensational advertisements, often succeed in terrifying the ignorant and the timid into the belief not merely that the sanctity of marriage is being assailed, and the Ark of God derided; but (deepest infamy of all!) that the holy institution of "property" is actually being menaced by the mob.

These professional demagogues make victims of their superiors. Here is what Lord Heneage is reported to have said at the laying of a foundation stone at Welhome Congregational Church: "The churches of every denomination had more in common than was sometimes thought. There was a vital reason why all Christians, no matter what they called themselves, should unite together against the new Socialism which was being brought forward in the country. Its three chief aims were the abolition of the Ten Commandments, the denial of our Lord, and the degradation of men and women to the level of the brute. If that was not an anti-Christian campaign, and a subject on which the great Christian churches could unite and put aside their petty differences, he didn't think they would ever be more closely drawn together." (Notts. Daily Express, October 16, 1907.)

In the face of such a policy, a policy, observe, not merely to gag the Church of Christ, but to prostitute its prophecy, and turn it into a bully for the Anti-Socialist campaign, one asks has THE INQUIRER no better lead to give its readers than to tell us that Christianity "must not be identified with any social theories, however beautiful, or any social methods, however good"? I think it is high time to sound another and less colourless note, and with your permission, I will try to sound it.

And first as to principles. I affirm that just as Christianity must constrain every thinking man to recognise the importance of doctrine, just as it must fire and drive the intellect of man to discover a satisfactory doctrinal structure and theological interpretation of its essential spirit, and cannot rest, murmuring peacefully that it must not identify itself with either Trinitarianism or Unitarianism, so precisely the same Holy enthusiasm and divine urgency of life must fire and drive men to discover a satisfactory social structure and economic interpretation of its essential spirit. As Mr. H. D. Lloyd says (quoted by Mr. Hobson, "The Social Problem, p. 140), "Change of heart is no more redemption than hunger is dinner. We must have honesty, love, justice, in the hearts of the business world; but we must also have the forms that will fit them."

Now, you may be quite right (you are quite right, I think) in saying that Christianity must not identify itself with a particular economic theory, but you are gravely wrong if you mean to suggest that Christians can redeem themselves or the world by abstaining from committing themselves to any scheme for perfecting the material arrangements of human society. Christianity must not indeed identify itself with, in the sense of exhausting itself in, a political scheme, but Christians must, if they have any salt of the gospel left in them, commit themselves whole-heartedly and unreservedly to some political and social effort, and perpetually dare and experiment until the perfect fabric of the Kingdom of God is founded on earth. And that seems to me to be the modern prophecy for Christian Individualists and Christian Socialists and for those of us (like myself) who are both at once. We may differ in a hundred points of political as of theological theory, but are we not in the main one in condemning the present social conditions as intolerable? Are we not one in the divine vision of a gladder, purer, and more righteous world? And do we not all recognise that if love is indeed to rule on earth, this love must function through the heart and brain of man and transform and transfigure the material conditions at the base of our life and use them for the sole ends of Love? In this passion for the world's redemption I am one, and I am sure you are, with our Socialist comrades. We recognise that the intensest moral earnestness, the most radiant moral hopes of the world burn in the breasts of these cruelly maligned reformers? The democratic and the religious sentiments are too closely allied to be ever separated. Nay, in their ultimate essence, they are absolutely identical, and the religion of humanity is also the religion of our God and of His Christ.

I do not grant or concede, but insist that the Christian Church is not a party organisation. It is, however, not the Socialist attempt (the charge is that it does not exist), but the Anti-Socialist attempt to make her so that makes my blood boil so that I can hardly contain myself. I agree that the duty of the Church is to be a witness of divine things in all the world, an organ of love and justice; the continuous embodiment of the mind of Christ. She is a fellowship of spirit that must maintain a stainless integrity (not above or remote from, but) in the midst of all parties, the stern arbiter as well as the divine consoler of mankind. She must refuse to bow to the mighty, or to pander to the populace. She is the prophet of the Kingdom of God, the abode of the eternal prayer that the Perfect Will may be done on earth as in heaven. Whenever she has been true to her mission, she has done something better than coldly abstain from identifying herself with this or that social theory, she has broken down the barriers of caste and snapped asunder the bonds of oppression, she has pulled down the mighty from their seat and exalted the humble and meek.

It is because the Church of Christ had a love of souls, and a care for bodies and had no respect of persons, and was rich in the spirit of her Master, that in early apostolic years she sympathised with the woes of the poor and found her first converts of the empire. She took the victims of the idle and cultivated rich in the arms of her mercy and taught them lessons of courage which raised them from being almost less than human into those martyrs and demi-gods that have shed the light of an everlasting inspiration down the vista of the centuries. She told them of a better time coming; she nerved them with an invincible endurance. She gladdened them with an immortal hope that sent them to the stake and to the arena with a serene and unearthly radiance on their countenances. She taught them not to quail before tortures and tyrannies, and filled their hearts with a faith in eternal righteousness that not all the conspiracies of the mighty, not the persecutions of emperors could extinguish.

What she did then, she can and will do again. If the powers of wealth should plot against her again it would be a great day of renovation for the Church. Let the men of riches attempt the policy of bribing her, or let them try to starve her if they will, let them withhold their help, withdraw their presence, close up their purses, and they will release all the suppressed vitality of the Church. Her pomp and worldly prosperity may be diminished—let it diminish if it be best so—but her spirit will spring up new-born into energy and fire. Her ministers will be impoverished in the things of this world. They will be compelled once more to live simple, self-abnegating lives. They will live even as the poor live, and the poor will believe in them, trust them, stand by them, clasp their hands and say, "Comrades," "God knows it, I am with you." . . .

"If sadness at the long heart-wasting show

Wherein earth's great ones are disquieted;
If thoughts, not idle, while before me flow
The armies of the homeless and unfed—
If these are yours, if this is what you are,
Then am I yours, and what you feel I share."

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

Nottingham.

[We are glad that our article should have called forth so eloquent a letter from Mr. Thomas. We cannot see, however, wherein we are proved wanting either in desire for social justice or in Christian sympathy because we have urged (1) that to call Socialists as a body irreligious is pure nonsense; (2) that Socialism is not identical with Christianity. We think that the habit of regarding middle-class congregations and ministers not definitely working on socialistic lines as irreligious or hypocritical is becoming far too general amongst Socialists. So far as any congregations and ministers are self-satisfied and careless of the misery in the world, of course, they are irreligious. But we were pleading for the recognition of the fact that Christianity may be connected with other theories and ideals than those of Socialism without being any the less Christian.—EDITOR pro tem.]

APPEAL FOR CHILDREN'S HOLIDAY FUND.

DEAR SIR,—A few months ago you kindly allowed me to ask your readers for subscriptions to our Country Holiday, Excursion, and Convalescent Fund, and to our Window Gardening Society, and I am very grateful to those friends who responded to that appeal. But, as their donations have not, by a long way, covered the amount I have spent, I venture to trouble you and your readers with a further appeal.

Arrangements for country holidays have to be made, of course, in the spring or early summer, when a few only of the subscriptions have been promised or paid, and before the treasurer knows what funds he will have at his disposal. He has, therefore, to set to work in faith, and trust that the money will be forthcoming. Perhaps the following figures will best explain the work done by this fund at Mansford-street this summer, as I hope they will prove to your readers my faith in their generosity:—71 Sunday-school children have been sent away for a fortnight into the country to Newbury and Halstead (toward this part of our work the London Sunday School Society makes a substantial grant from its Country Holiday Fund); 48 elder scholars and teachers have been helped to a holiday at Southend, Birchington, and elsewhere, which they could not otherwise have enjoyed; 31 mothers and children have been sent to Hampstead and Billingshurst; and 7 other convalescent cases have been helped. And, in addition to this, the heavy expenses of the Mothers' Meeting and Sunday School Annual Excursions have to be met out of this fund.

The result of all this is, Mr. Editor, that I have overdrawn the account of this fund by over £30—including a large deficit from last year—to pay off this debt. I earnestly ask for subscriptions from your readers.

The Window Gardening Society endeavours to encourage the growth of bulbs and plants in the homes of the people. A "Window Garden" competition was successfully carried through this summer, with the help of the Metropolitan Public Gardens Association, and a good "show" of plants was held in July. We want a few annual subscriptions to cover the cost of the prizes and the loss incurred on the sale of the bulbs and plants. Our great need must be the excuse for the length of this letter.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The annual meeting and first musical festival of the North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union was held at Richmond Hill church and school on Saturday last. About 250 persons partook of tea in the school-room, after which the annual meeting was held in the church. Miss Dornan, the new President, presided. The minutes of the last annual meeting were read and confirmed, the financial statement, showing a small increased balance in hand, was presented by Mr. F. Hepworth (Oldham) the treasurer, and the annual report was read by Mr. Albert Slater (Hyde), the hon. secretary. The officers for the ensuing year were then elected and the president introduced the musical festival, which was the first held in connection with the Union. The Union consists of 14 affiliated schools, and the chancel was well filled by a choir of 140 voices from the choirs and singing classes of nine of the schools. Mr. W. Woolley (Gee Cross) acted as conductor, and Mr. James Broadbent (organist at the church) acted as organist and accompanist. The church was filled, there being over 400 persons present. The programme opened with the singing of the hymn, "O thou to whom in ancient time," followed by prayer offered by Rev. John Barron; the following items including: by the choir, part song, "The Singers" (A. R. Gaul); anthem, "Send out thy light" (Gounod); chorus, "How lovely are the messengers" (Mendelssohn); and anthem, "Sing a song of praise" (Stainer). The following solos were also given, bass, "Calvary" (Rodney), Mr. A. Baddeley, Gee Cross; soprano, "Beyond" (St. Quentin), Miss S. Bromley, Denton; tenor, "The better land" (Cowen), Mr. John Axon, Flowery Field; contralto, "Come to me, O ye children" (Anderton), Miss A. Jackson, Oldham. Not the least interesting item of the programme was the address delivered by Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, President of the National Conference, who is conducting a series of special services in the churches of the district. His subject was "Youth, and how to make its joys endure." Two other hymns were joined in by all, and the benediction brought one of the most successful gatherings of the Union to a close. On Sunday, 20th inst., the school sermons in connection with Richmond Hill, were preached by Pandit J. C. Chatterji (Chattopadhyaya), who came to Ashton direct from India, to keep the appointment. The subject for the day, which was dealt with in three discourses, was "Three great divisions of life from the standpoint of a Hindu." (1) Preparation and instruction. (2) The activities of mature life. (3) The consummation or realisation of the end of life. The collections, including special donations, amounted to about £20, being more than double of the anniversary in the previous year.

Birmingham: Small Heath.—The thirteenth anniversary of the congregation of Waverley-road Church was celebrated on Sunday, when appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. William C. Hall. In spite of the very inclement weather, the attendance at the services was larger than that of previous years, and the collections showed a proportionate increase. The congregation has a full programme of work for the winter, and is making steady progress with its membership.

Blackpool: South Shore.—The harvest services were held on Sunday, October 13, when the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., preached. There were good attendances at the services, and the collections were in advance of previous years. On Wednesday, October 16, through the kindness of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Rev. John Page Hopps delivered a lecture to an appreciative audience on "A Scientific Basis of Belief in a Future Life."

Bradford: Broadway Avenue Church.—The first anniversary services in connection with the opening of this church were held on Sunday, and were largely attended. The Rev. Wm. Rosling, in the morning, gave a gratifying review of the year's work, and in the evening the Rev. Chas. Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds, preached a thoughtful and helpful sermon. In the afternoon Mr. J. Burnhill gave an address.

Brighton.—Anniversary services were held on Oct. 20 and 21. The Rev. W. J. Jupp, of Croydon, conducted the Sunday services, and gave thoughtful and valued discourses on "Life" and "Progress." The church meeting on Monday evening was preceded by a social tea, with some music; fraternal sympathy and help was shown by the presence of the Rev. J. Felstead (Lewes), the Rev. J. J. Marten (Horsham), the Rev. S. Burrows (Hastings), the Rev. W. J. Jupp for the Monday meeting; and all these friends gave encouraging addresses. Visitors were also present from Ditchling and Lewes. A welcome innovation at the Sunday evening service was a reading from "Psalms of the West."

Gateshead.—The Rev. G. A. Ferguson has resigned his position as minister of this church, to the sincere regret of the congregation. Mr. Ferguson has been acting as secretary of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association, and his recent intimation of his resignation to that body was received with many tokens of appreciation of his services. On Wednesday, the 23rd inst., Mr. Ferguson gave a lecture on the Esperantist Congress at Cambridge before a large audience of the Guild of Fellowship. During the evening Dr. Green, who presided, made a presentation to Mr. Ferguson on behalf of the Gateshead Esperantist Association.

Lancaster.—Under the auspices of the "North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association," and the B. and F.U.A., the Rev. John Page Hopps visited our venerable old chapel on Monday evening last and gave his popular lecture on "What Unitarians have to offer to the world." Although the lecture had been advertised only a few days, and despite the fact that the business of many of our people prevented them from being present, there was an audience of over two hundred adults, a large proportion of them being strangers. It was also noted that every church and chapel in the town seemed to be represented. The lecture was listened to with rapt attention, and the constant signs of approval and applause—loud and long, continued at the end—testified to the full and entire sympathy of the audience. Our minister, the Rev. J. C. Pollard, resumed his duties, after his recent visit to America, on Sunday week, where large congregations—in the evening filling the chapel—asssembled to give him a welcome back. The Lancaster papers gave a résumé of his sermon.

Liverpool: Hope-street.—Rev. H. D. Roberts, preaching on Sunday morning last, referred to the death of Mrs. Watson in the following terms: "On this, my first opportunity, it is right and fitting that I make one reference and say one word, in affectionate memory of a kindly soul passed into the unseen since we met together here. It is of one whose love to this church was ever faithful and true, and who rejoiced greatly in the traditions of it. Living day by day in the spirit of its best teaching, working out a gentle, kindly life of quiet zeal and unostentatious self-sacrifice, doing what in her lay to further the true, the good, and the loving—friends, if this church would count up the jewels in her treasury, she must be able to point to lives like these. Alice Watson's life I count among such jewels. In her earlier days here she was known as Alice Bryson, the pupil and most devoted friend of Miss Lewin; and Miss Lewin's influence over her has been apparent throughout, whether we look at her life as spent within her home, or given to the young and struggling cause at Garston, which was to her as the apple of her eye. To some it may appear as of but a sombre hue—a sombre homespun. To me—surely to any man who ventures to take upon him the name of minister—such a life is the triumphant vindication of the Divine benediction upon a church; lifting into picturesque loveliness all that we blindly call commonplace, and winding into the fabric of undistinguished rounds that golden thread of idealism which turns it into something strangely rich and rare. And it is our greatest cause of thanksgiving on this our re-opening day, that the real beauty of Hope-street Church, dignified and beautiful as it is, lies—not in soaring arch and glowing colour, and chaste symbolism, but in the loving service of gentle lives like hers. Without that all else is less than nothing in the eternal values. With it, we have here indeed the temple of the living God. It is not for me to pay any detailed tribute to the things which were 'more excellent' in this life. That has already been done amid the immediate scenes of it. But in this place, which she ever held as her spiritual home, we cast to-day a tender thought towards her who was humbly faithful unto death. A little while ago I wandered in that 'Sleepy Hollow,' that hallowed spot where Emerson rests in the midst of the familiar beauty his soul loved, and I came upon these sweet old words; they are placed upon another honoured grave, though a less famous than his. They seemed to me to speak of Alice Watson; not only because she, too, in her pilgrimage passed in her sleep to the unseen, but because of the more divine, more mysterious truth which underlies them; 'THE PILGRIM. They laid in a large upper chamber, whose windows opened towards the sunrising. The name of the chamber was Peace. There he slept till break of day. And then he awoke and sang!'"

Manchester: Bradford.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday last. The afternoon service was conducted by the Rev. W. E. Atack, and the address given by Mrs. Manning. The evening service was conducted by the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A. The children's choir had been well trained by Mr. F. Whittaker, and they rendered pretty music for the occasion. There was a large attendance both afternoon and evening.

Manchester: Pendleton.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday last, conducted in the morning and evening by the minister, the Rev. N. Anderton, B.A. In the afternoon there was a children's service conducted by Alderman F. S. Phillips, J.P. Large congregations attended the services. The church was prettily decorated. At the evening service Mr. Anderton gave the third of a series of four lectures, the subject being "The Religion of the Body."

Manchester: Platt Chapel.—In order to raise funds for congregational purposes, a sale of work was held by the ladies of the congregation in the school, Portland-grove, on Saturday, October 12, when the chair was taken by Mr. Sydney Jones, of Liverpool, and Lady Talbot declared the sale opened, with some very kind and appreciative words of encouragement. Special mention was made of the late Mr. Joseph Broome, who had been chapel warden for many years, and the memory of whose co-operation will always be cherished by all his friends. One of the stalls was entirely furnished by the Sunday-school. The sale was very successful, and all were pleased with the results. On the following Saturday, October 19, a concert and dramatic performance was given in the same school for the same purpose. Miss Lily Potter made all the arrangements for the concert, and secured the services of excellent artistes.

North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association.—Through the kindness of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association the Rev. J. Page Hopps (of London) lectured to notable gatherings. At South Shore, Blackpool (103), Ansdell (80), Blackburn (320), Preston (180), and Lancaster (210), on October 16 to 21 inclusive, and lectures at Kendal and Chorley on the 22nd and 23rd inst. The whole of these lectures have been much appreciated.

Preston.—On Saturday afternoon the annual service of the North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association was held in the Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, Preston. The sermon was delivered by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, of London. Following tea in the schoolroom a largely attended public meeting was held, Mr. W. H. Sutcliffe, of Chorley, president of the association, presiding. Mr. Richard Robinson, of Manchester, spoke on "State and Church." The officials were elected as follows:—Mr. W. H. Sutcliffe (Chorley), president; Mr. E. S. Heywood, St. Annes, secretary; Mr. C. Stewart (Preston), treasurer; and the Rev. C. Travers (Preston), auditor. The Rev. J. Page Hopps also addressed the gathering. The choir, under the leadership of Mr. Stewart, gave a meritorious performance.

Sheffield.—The members of the Unitarian churches in the Sheffield district assembled to extend a very cordial welcome to the local delegates to the International Congress at Boston, U.S.A., upon their return to this country. The occasion afforded an excellent opportunity for Unitarians in the Sheffield churches to effect a happy re-union, and it was taken advantage of to a large extent. There was a very numerous attendance. The proceedings opened with a tea in the Channing Hall, Surrey-street. This was followed by an interesting organ recital by Mr. A. Bagshaw in Upper Chapel. Subsequently a public meeting was held in the Channing Hall. Mr. M. J. Hunter presided, and he was accompanied on the platform by Mr. A. J. Hobson and by the five local delegates to the Congress, namely, the Rev. C. J. Street (Upper Chapel), the Rev. A. H. Dolphin (Upperthorpe), the Rev. J. Ruddle (Stannington), Mr. T. Beaumont, and Mr. H. R. Bramley. Mr. A. J. Hobson extended a welcome to the delegates on their return from the International Congress at Boston. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin (Upperthorpe) in thanking them for the welcome, related some of his experiences during his recent travels. The Congress at Boston—at which there were delegates from sixteen different nations—he described as "an inspiring and helpful series of meetings." "What does your welcome mean?" he said, in conclusion. "I hope it means that you are welcoming us to increased zeal and interest in our work. I hope that as the result of our experience our work in the future may be better than it has been in the past." (Applause.) The Rev. J. Ruddle (Stannington) stated that the visit to America had done him good, by making him realise the value of cheerfulness in life. The Rev. C. J. Street spoke of the conditions of the Unitarian Churches in Canada and the United States as being very encouraging. The possibilities in Canada, he said, were simply immense. He had come away with a very good impression of the future that lay before our Canadian fellow subjects. "I believe that untold developments are likely to occur in that vast Continent," added Mr. Street. "I believe the United States has had the last century in which to make its name and career. And I believe that Canada will have the present century to make its name and career. With regard to our churches, every one of those I visited is in a healthy and flourishing condition." (Applause.) On the motion of Mr. H. R. Bramley, seconded by Mr. T. Beaumont, a vote of thanks was passed to the ladies who had provided the tea, and to the artistes.

Stand.—On the invitation of the minister (Rev. R. Travers Herford) and the chairman of the chapel committee (Mr. W. T. Jones), a successful meeting of members of the chapel and elder scholars of the school took place on Saturday last. After tea a proposal was laid before the meeting for an extension of the school buildings to commemorate the centenary of the school next year. The present school-buildings were erected in 1893, in commemoration of the bi-centenary of the chapel. The number of scholars has since increased considerably, and the intention is to provide additional class-rooms and a social or lecture-room, at a cost of about £400. The scheme was heartily adopted by the meeting, and a substantial sum towards the cost was subscribed in the room.

Stratford.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held on Sunday, October 13, conducted by Mr. D. Delta Evans, who took for his subject, "Joy in Religion" and "Seed Time and Harvest." There was a good attendance in the evening. Mr. Evans also addressed the Sunday-school children in the afternoon. The decorations of the church included flowers and berries sent from Hampstead and Oxford.

Tavistock.—Harvest thanksgiving services were held at the Abbey Chapel on Sunday, when the Rev. Ernest Betham preached for the first time as Unitarian minister of this town. The chapel was prettily decorated, and special music was well rendered. At the evening service, when the chapel was crowded, the Rev. Ernest Betham, taking the omnipresence of the Divine Power as his theme, outlined the development of man's ideas in regard to God, calling attention to the earlier books of the Bible as showing how essentially local was the first God-worship of the Israelites. Their Jehovah was held to be intimate only to their tribes, and their little corner of Asia His only place of communion with human kind. In the later books a great enlargement of apprehension had come to the stronger and more capable minds among them, and in such a Psalm as the 139th occurred passages eloquent of the immanence of God through all the visible creation such as were parallel to our most modern interpretations of the phenomena of existence. Passing to the belief of the early Christians, though to them the worship of God had become also service to man, and social sacredness was the ideal of the teaching of the inspired Nazarene, yet, even by them, there was a separatist view taken of God. Exactly as to the first Israelites Jehovah was theirs and theirs alone, so, to the first Christians, God was familiar only to their own small community; the rest of the world was alien to Him. There might be a danger to modern minds that they also should believe that their own particular scientific theory was the exclusive revealer of the mystery of life. The speaker went on to suggest that it were well to realise that while there was but the one supreme power and purpose, there were countless aspects of His glory; and each age, each race, each school of thought could but catch one expression of the Divine manifestation. The human mind might be likened to a man emerging from a cavern in a vast mountain side where four lines of vision met. On one side stretched the multitudinous cities of social life; these he could explore and somewhat comprehend. On the other hung dense forests where the animals moved, living their own life: these also he could somewhat understand. Beneath him sloping down to ocean were the rudimentary growths of physical being, and below the surface of the endless water, things more elementary still: these also he could subject to the analysis of his intelligence. But above him the mountain sides went steeply up to clouds and light: to these he could but lift his eyes, and see therein visions of those ideals named heaven and God. While in his mortal body, he could not know more in this sublime direction, other than by vision. But to whichever quarter he directed his mind, and by whichever particular presentment of life his worshipful study was attracted, there was such radiation of the universal power as gave to the modern that inspiration of reverence recounted in the Mosaic allegory; "Take thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place where thou standest is holy ground." On Wednesday a members' tea in the Town Hall was followed by a social evening. After tea, General Jacob said that he had great pleasure in giving expression to the views of the congregation in that they all spontaneously wished to give a hearty welcome to Mr. Betham, who had a very high record. He was under the most distinguished clergymen of their denomination, Mr. Chignell, of whom he was a great friend. He was a thoroughly good, hard-working man, and was quite prepared to do his utmost for the chapel. They had to meet him half-way, and to give him every encouragement they could by good attendance as far as possible every Sunday. Of course, a good many could not come out in the morning, but there was no reason why they could not come out in the evening. They wished Mr. Betham every happiness and success in his work. (Hear, hear, and applause.) In acknowledging the kind and cordial welcome given him by General Jacob, as the spokesman of the congregation, Mr. Betham expressed his happiness at finding himself associated with the Abbey Chapel—a chapel small of structure but large of meaning. He believed that there must be a number of people who did not attend any of the places of worship in Tavistock, so that there was very considerable room for growth. A minister among the Unitarians was not a priest: he might perform certain humanly serviceable rites, but he did so as the delegate of the community of worshippers of whom he was one. There was no division of responsibility, though the minister gave a fulness of study to spiritual knowledge that would not be possible were he not free of time so to do. He looked forward to the future with every hope that there would be a strong accord of work amongst them, and a public usefulness in the highest sense of that term. (Applause.)

West Bromwich: Lodge-road.—Harvest festival, was celebrated on Sunday, Oct. 13. Special music was rendered by the choir, including "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works" (Barnby) and "The God of Abraham praise" (Arthur Cooke). The Sunday-school choir made its first appearance at the church services, and gave a pleasing rendering of a hymn by the pastor. The church was very prettily decorated. The pastor (Rev. F. A. Homer) preached appropriate sermons morning and evening.

Yorkshire Sunday-school Union.—The first conference of the season was held at Pudsey on Saturday, Oct. 19th, and was attended by between seventy and eighty friends, including representatives from the three churches at Leeds, the two at Bradford, and from Huddersfield, Idle, &c. After the usual tea the president, Mr. E. O. Dodgson, of Leeds, introduced the Rev. H. McLachlan, M.A., B.D., who read an excellent paper on—"Some Difficulties of Sunday-school Teaching." An interesting series of short speeches followed on points suggested by the paper, Messrs. Marsland, Clayton, Hill, Noble, and Binks, and the Revs. Rosling, Eastlake, and Shanks, being among the speakers. The president summed up the discussion, and the reader of the paper replied effectively to his critics. The meeting was a very successful one.

Yorkshire Unitarian Club.—This club was founded on November 24, 1906, the chairman being Mr. Henry Lupton. Its first annual meeting was held on Saturday last, October 19, at Northgate End Chapel, Halifax. According to the annual report the lay membership is 60, and the number of honorary (ministerial) members 7, total 67. The officers and four members of the committee were elected as follows:—President, Mr. A. H. Wadsworth (Halifax); vice-president, Mr. J. Hargreaves (Bradford); hon. treasurer, Mr. F. G. Jackson; and hon. secretary, Mr. A. Simpson, both of Leeds. Committee, Messrs. F. T. Chapman, Wm. Skelton, C. F. Wilkinson (Leeds); and Mr. Joseph Burn-Hill (Cleckheaton). Owing to serious family illness the Rev. H. McLachlan, M.A., B.D., of Leeds, to the great regret of the meeting, was unable to be present to read his paper on "Some Sixteenth Century Exponents of Liberal Religion." The Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Leeds, kindly acted for Mr. McLachlan. The paper gave an account of those forerunners of liberal religion, and champions of political freedom ("officers without an army"), Zwingli, Ochino, the uncle and nephew Sozzini, and Servetus. An interesting discussion followed. The club is open to both men and women. New members wanted. Minimum annual subscription 1s., which may be paid either to the hon. treasurer, Mr. F. G. Jackson, 8, Park-lane, Leeds, or to the hon. secretary, Mr. A. Simpson, 17, Parkfield Mount, Beeston, Leeds. Next meeting, Saturday, December 28, at Leeds; lecturer, Dr. Carpenter.

EDITED BY

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., D.Litt., D.D.THE EARLY CHURCH*Its Orders and Institutions.*By A. HERMANN THOMAS, M.A.

(OF ST. CATHARINE'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE).

THIS little volume is a sequel to the manual entitled Christianity and the Roman Empire, by the Rev. W. Addis, M.A. (1893). Assuming the relations to the state described in that book, it endeavours to delineate in simple terms the complicated phases of the internal growth and organisation of the Church.

To sketch the process by which the Christian Church gradually acquired a particular kind of government, and embodied its faith and hope in special rites, which ultimately secured its predominance over all rivals, is the object of this book. Within its narrow limits much is inevitably left unsaid. But to those who desire some acquaintance with the origin of the claims and practices of historic Christianity, it is commended as a useful guide.

MR. R. B. HALDANE AND
"PUBLIC OPINION."

The Right Hon. R. B. Haldane, M.P.,
Secretary for War, has addressed the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION :—

WAR OFFICE, 1st October, 1907.

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion" under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed on men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists, the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.

Yours faithfully,
R. B. HALDANE.

INTERLINEAR BIBLE

printed in the same clear type as the
India Paper edition published last year

BOUND IN CLOTH, 7s. 6d. net. IN LEATHER, from 10s. net

THE INTERLINEAR BIBLE is so printed that both Authorised and Revised Versions may be read with ease from one text. It displays at a glance the position, extent and nature of the differences between the Versions. The simple plan adopted is shown in the accompanying passage, which, read along the upper line throughout, gives the Revised Version, and, along the lower, the Authorised. "Since the publication of the Revised Version," says the Westminster Gazette, "several attempts have been made to produce Bibles in which the different readings of the two Versions would be clearly seen.
By far the most successful effort in this direction is The Interlinear Bible."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR Editor reached home on Wednesday in excellent health, and after a pleasant voyage. In this week's issue will be found a final letter from him, which managed to get in front by two days. Bringing further sheaves with him he comes again rejoicing, and the "Editor pro tem," bows and surrenders the chair.

ONLY two or three more of the Boston party are yet to arrive, and it is a matter of gratification and gratitude that so many travellers have travelled so long without, so far as we know, any very serious mishap. And now the talk is of lectures on the tour; will camera-men and women of the party please note Mr. Tarrant's letter to the Editor this week?

FATHER TYRRELL, the celebrated exponent of "modernist" thought, has incurred sentence of condemnation by his recent answer to the Pope's Encyclical letter forbidding liberty of opinion. Whether he is yet absolutely excommunicated or not appears to be in some doubt, but there is no doubt that he is under the shadow of it. The event surprises few, we imagine. It illustrates once more the incompatibility of liberty and the priest, and forbodes ill for those who are engaged in the forlorn hope of saving Roman Catholicism from the limbo of things discredited and outgrown. We have only space here to refer readers to Professor Addis's article on "The Pope's Encyclical" in the new Contemporary Review, where, whatever may be thought of the Professor's own theology, there is a trenchant exposure of the futile policy of the Vatican.

SIR OLIVER LODGE delivered the first Drew Lecture at the Memorial Hall, London, on Tuesday evening. The lecture, which is to be printed in substance in the Hibbert Journal, dealt with the nature and destiny of the human soul. He dismissed the notion of a bodily resurrection as a "pagan superstition"—at which epithet an assenting smile seemed to pervade the whole of the crowded audience. Yet, probably, if Dr. Horton, or other leader, had risen at the close and asked those present to recite the Apostles' Creed, they would have had no difficulty in concurring. So strange are the usages of theologians, and the misuses of language. As might be expected, Sir Oliver's lecture steadfastly maintained the indestructibility of "the soul"—"that controlling and guiding principle which is responsible for our consciousness and will, as well as for our personal expression, and for the construction of the body under the restrictions of physical condition and ancestry."

A LIFE-SIZE bust of George Jacob Holyoake as he appeared in the later years of his life has been sculptured by Mr. Albert Toft for the Co-operative Union, and will be placed on a pedestal of Aberdeen granite in Highgate Cemetery, to which the ashes of Mr. Holyoake's body were transferred after cremation at Golder's Green. The pedestal will bear the inscription: "George Jacob Holyoake. Born April 13, 1817. Died January 22, 1906. Erected by the Co-operators of Great Britain. A Tribute to the Memory of a Great Leader and Fellow Worker." Very significant are the two quotations which will also be read on the monument: "Without honesty to principle there can be no progress in public affairs," and "I have cared more for co-operation than for any other movement in which I have been engaged." The latter was the message he sent to his fellow-workers in the movement in his last days.

THE useful meetings of the National Union of women workers held this year in Manchester, concluded on the 24th. A valuable contribution was made by Miss McArthur, who read a paper on the organisation of women's labour. She stated that the average wage of the female manual worker in Great Britain was less than 7s. 6d. a week. Only 140,000 of the 5,000,000 women workers were as yet trade unionists; but encouragement may be drawn from the fact that the figure is even as large as it is; for forty years ago there were fewer men in the movement. Lack of organisation was both a result and a cause of under-payment. The poorest workers could never organise until they were better paid. She declared that sweating was far worse among the fashionable dress-makers of the West-End than under the Jews of East London. A representative of the Women's Co-operative Guild spoke subsequently of the admirable work done by the 24,000 members of its branches.

IN the course of the proceedings the evils of a "pocket money" wage were severely stigmatised by Miss Mabel Hope and others. It was justly claimed that women should receive like wages with men for like work. Many men clerks have recently written to the newspapers making a similar claim, and saying that they did not object to the employment of women if they were more capable or equally capable. What they objected to was the posts being filled by women because they would accept a lower wage.

THE difficulty seems to be that women cannot be readily induced to combine or agree to a scale of payment below which they will not accept a post. Many of them have homes with their parents, and are not entirely dependent on their wages. Their acceptance of a low wage keeps down to an inadequate amount the remuneration of their fellow women, who have to earn a livelihood perhaps for others as well as themselves, and often throws out of work men who may have families dependent upon them. It is eminently desirable that, in competing with men for employment, women should do so on the ground of equal efficiency, not by offering cheap services.

PROPOSALS have been made by the Council of the Congregational Union that in future the Chairman should be appointed by ballot through the post. In certain contingencies provision is made for a second ballot. After a considerable amount of discussion by the Assembly, the matter has been referred back to the Council.

WE learn from the Methodist Times that the venerable Dr. Rigg has issued a pamphlet on "The Class-Meeting Fellowship of Wesleyan Methodism," in which he says: "The Methodist Church is a contexture, a web of such class-meetings; do away with these classes and the whole web, the whole vital growth and structure of Wesleyan Methodism, is destroyed. As a Church system it would no longer exist. The class-meeting is the matrix within which every element characteristic of Methodism is nurtured in vital union with the whole growth and development of its Church life." Such an utterance from so high an authority is bound to have its effect on the proposed reforms in the basis of Church membership to which we referred last week. Unquestionably, the religion of experience is the only religion of real value, but inasmuch as some good Methodists shrink from the public experiential note, it should be possible, without sacrificing the vital characteristics of Methodism, to open a wider door to those who wish to enter by it.

THERE was a notable assembly of delegates from municipalities and associations interested in good housing at the Guildhall on Friday of last week. The subject of conference was Town Planning, for which all present were heartily agreed there is urgent need. One speaker after another, mayors of provincial towns, members of housing societies and committees, architects, medical officers and sociologists, spoke of the barriers to the progress of their work due to legal inability to enforce any large and wisely conceived general plan for the districts into which their towns were extending, or in new urban districts, as in South Wales, now being rapidly covered with incongruous rows of houses destined to become slums in the course of time. The promised legislation of the Government by a Bill, already drafted, was welcomed, and the need for the preservation of a belt of agricultural land around or in the neighbourhood of any new suburb or town that may be built was especially dwelt upon. Mr. Rider Haggard spoke in favour of this, and held that Government intervention was necessary to obtain decent housing in rural districts.

MR. T. C. HORSFALL, of Manchester, who has made himself a thoroughly well informed authority on the housing and town planning methods of other countries, declared that, of civilised countries, only England, France, and the United States are without laws empowering local authorities to determine the general plan of the growth of their towns, and in the United States much is done by voluntary enterprise and the lavish generosity of wealthy men in the desired direction. The different attitude of the central authorities in Germany from that which has hitherto prevailed in England, was exemplified by the fact that recently in two instances the Government had brought pressure to bear on local authorities to induce them to acquire considerable tracts of land in their own neighbourhood for the public good.

THE presence on a recent Thursday evening of Mrs. Annie Besant in the pulpit of the City Temple is a proof of the broadening influence at work in that progressive centre. For an hour Mrs. Besant discoursed on "Spiritual Life for the Man of the World." This remarkable lecture, of which we can give but a single extract, may be obtained post free for 1½d., from the Christian Commonwealth Co., Ltd., 133, Salisbury-square, E.C. She said:—

"For there is one thing greater even than duty, and that is when all action is done as sacrifice. Now, what does that mean? There would be no world, no you, no I, if there had not been a primary sacrifice by which a fragment of the Divine thought sheathed itself in matter, limited itself in order that you and I might become self-consciously divine. There is a profound truth in that great Christian teaching of a lamb slain—When? On Calvary? No, 'from the foundation of the world.' That is the great truth of sacrifice. No divine sacrifice, no universe. No divine self-limitations, none of the worlds which fill the realms of space. It is all a sacrifice, the sacrifice of love that limits itself that others may gain self-conscious being and rejoice in the perfection of their own ultimate divinity. And, inasmuch as the life of the world is based on sacrifice, all true life is also sacrificial; and when every action is done as sacrifice, then the man becomes the perfect, spiritual man."

THE death of Gerald Massey recalls the bad old times when children of tender years were forced into the mills. He was one of a bargeman's family of thirteen. At the age of eight he began work in a silk factory, where his "happy day of childhood" lasted from five in the morning till half-past six in the evening. It is one of the romances, as people say, of literature, that a poor boy so placed should win for himself an honourable place in the company of poets. The "Cry of the Children" is heard again to-day, more than sixty years after Elizabeth Barrett Browning voiced it, and so long as greed and drink are rampant the piteous tale will have to be told anew of privation, cruelty, and degradation. But at least our laws are better than they were, and we hope the people are.

"THE Cult of the Rifle and the Cult of Peace" (cloth 1s. net), which Messrs. T. Sealey Clark & Co., Ltd., 1, Racquet-court, Fleet-street, E.C., has just published, is a new work on the Peace Movement from the pen of Mr. H. S. Perris, M.A. The author gives special attention to recent phases of militarist propaganda, such as that of Lord Roberts and the National Service League, and suggests a further organisation of the Peace Movement in this country in view of the new and more favourable conditions. The book contains a brief Bibliography of Peace, charts of naval and military expenditure, and a section on the proposed adoption of the Swiss militia system. The volume will form a useful handbook for those interested in the movement toward international peace. Mr. Stephen Reid, R.B.A., contributes an original frontispiece, and there is a prefatory note by Dr. Rendel Harris, President of the National Free Church Council.

THE Rev. W. H. Drummond, of Belfast, whose initials are familiar to readers of our literary notes, will set out towards the end of the month on a rest tour of several months in and about the Mediterranean. A host of friends will wish him a prosperous journey, and a return in full vigour.

LAYMEN'S CLUB.

ON Friday, October 25, a largely attended Conference (preceded by dinner), was held at the Inns of Court Hotel, Mr. A. Savage-Cooper, president, in the chair. A welcome was given to Mr. H. B. Lawford on his return from Boston, and in reply he gave some account of his experiences as representative of the Club, by whose efforts the fund, initiated by Dr. G. Herbert Smith, had been raised, so as to enable a large number of ministers to attend the Boston Conference.

The following resolution was passed:—

1. That a sub-committee be formed, entitled the Advisory Sub-Committee on Boys' Clubs; the objects being:—

(a) To encourage athletics.

(b) To collect and distribute information as to the working of boys' clubs and similar institutions.

(c) To encourage competitions among such clubs, and to supervise or assist in conducting existing competitions, including the gymnastic competition for the Laymen's Club Shield.

2. That the following members be invited to act on the sub-committee:—R. N. Ballantyne (Convener and Secretary), A. Barnes, R. Bartram, W. J. Clark, Rev. G. Cooper, H. Gimson, R. P. Jones, W. R. Marshall, H. Oakeshott, W. T. Pritchard, S. Talbot, and other members who may be specially interested in the work of the sub-committee.

MR. H. G. CHANCELLOR read a paper on the subject "What can the Laymen's Club do to further the interests of Liberal Religious Thought?" He said the tie that bound the members together was one of spiritual affinity. They belonged to that Club because they were religious freethinkers. That being so, he held that the Club, as a club, ought to count in the great liberalising movement which is permeating all the churches. He thought no good would come of trying to turn the Club into a denominational organisation, or into anything that would overlap existing bodies of workers. The most practical way of serving the outside world, he said, was by kindling the zeal, confirming the faith, encouraging the hope, and widening the charity of its own members. Those who had been "born in the faith" were not so likely, he feared, to value it as those who had only attained to it through struggle and pain. After delineating his own experience as typical of that of others, he made an earnest appeal to members to help in bringing light to such minds. In particular, could they not furnish aid as lay preachers? He believed that "if ever our glorious Gospel is to have free course amongst the masses we shall have to cease our dependence on the professional ministry, or the stated services in church they will not attend, and as laymen take up and help in carrying the burden of our message."

There were present a large number of the London ministers, who had been specially invited, and several took part in the discussion that followed, including Revs. W. G. Tarrant, Dr. Cressey, A. A. Charlesworth, H. Rawlings, and F. K. Freeston. Interesting speeches were also made by some of the lay members, the general feeling appearing to be one of warm appreciation of Mr. Chancellor's address, and of hope that it may add to our staff of lay preachers, REPORT OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, B. & F.U.A.

THE varied work of the Association can only be efficiently carried on by the appointment of sub-committees to whom all matters requiring detailed consideration are first referred. The following are the chairmen for the current year:—Finance, Mr. Ion Pritchard; Home Mission, Rev. Charles Roper; Publications, Rev. James Harwood; Foreign Mission, Rev. V. D. Davis; Scottish Work, Mr. Percy Preston; Civil Rights and Trusts, Dr. W. Blake Odgers; Anniversary and General Purposes, Mr. H. B. Lawford.

Finance.

The financial position of the Association has occupied the serious attention of the committee. Although nearly ten months of the year have passed, the anonymous subscription of £1,000 cannot yet be claimed. The treasurer requires £350 additional subscriptions before the £1,000 can be applied for. The income from all sources, for the nine months ending September 30, has been £6,185, and the expenditure £5,930. The accounts in the office and the grants that are payable have already converted the balance of £255 into a deficit of £270. In connection with the Unitarian Van work the sum of £732 has been received and £959 expended. The donations amounted to £217, and a legacy of £500 has been received from the executors of the late Mr. W. Colfox, and a like amount from the estate of the late Mrs. Grundy of Bury. The claims upon the funds of the Association are increasing at home and from abroad; and the committee earnestly desire to respond to every reasonable and well-considered appeal for aid. A large increase in the number of subscribers is therefore required. The Association Sunday collections on November 17 will afford the members of our congregations an opportunity of contributing to the funds of the Association. The office and other expenses are more than met by the income from investments, so that the money received in collections and subscriptions is expended in actual missionary work.

Publications.

In the publication department, several new books have been issued, including "The Sources of our Knowledge of the Life of Jesus," by Professor Wernle, and "Paul," by Dr. Wrede, both translated from the German by the Rev. E. W. Lummis; these volumes have had a very large circulation in Germany, and it is hoped that they will find many readers in England. A little book by the late Mr. Herbert Rix, "Jesus as Rabbi, Messiah, Martyr," will be prized because of its great merits and as a memorial of a thoughtful and devoted student of the life and religion of Jesus. The second series of Dr. Martineau's "Endeavours after the Christian Life" has been issued in paper covers, and in cloth binding with a portrait. A new edition of the lectures on "Religious Ideas" by the late William Johnson Fox, M.P., with a brief biographical sketch, has recently been published.

The American Unitarian Association has been very active of late in publishing new books, and the committee have issued editions of the following at a price which ought to command a large sale in this country:—"The Understanding Heart," by Dr. S. M. Crothers; "Four American Leaders," by President C. W. Eliot; "Daughters of the Puritans," by Seth Curtis Beach; and "Father Taylor," by Dr. Robert Collyer.

Suggestions were received from a large number of ministers and laymen concerning the preparation of a volume of readings from the Bible for use in the church and the home. While the committee were considering what had better be done, they learned that the Rev. U. G. B. Pierce, of Washington, U.S.A., had compiled such a volume under the title of "The Soul of the Bible." Sheets have been purchased from the American Unitarian Association, and copies will be on sale at Essex Hall within a few weeks. There is also in preparation a volume containing a selection of Dr. Robert Collyer's sermons, with an introduction by the Rev. Charles Hargrove. The committee have much pleasure in reporting to the Council that an important book covering practically the whole field of Christian theology, by Dr. James Drummond, former Principal of Manchester College, is now in the press and will probably be published by the end of November.

Additions have been made to the series of Unitarian Tracts, and several of the more popular ones have been reprinted. The Pocket Almanac and the Year Book for 1908 are in course of preparation. Corrections and suggestions should be forwarded to the Editor without delay.

The grants of Unitarian tracts since the last meeting of the Council reached a total of 55,000—about 40,000 were circulated in connection with the work of the four vans. Upwards of 2,000 books were presented to public libraries, ministers, and lay-preachers. No less than 73 orthodox ministers applied on their own initiative for a grant of books by Unitarian writers. The value of these grants of books and tracts at home and abroad since the last meeting of the Council amounted to £286. The Book-room sales for the nine months ending September 30 exceed £1,000, but this amount might be double if the members of the Association and the public were made better acquainted with the publications as they are issued.

Home Mission Work.

In addition to the grants voted for the year 1907, reported to the Council in March, the following congregations have been assisted:—Ashton-under-Lyne, Blackburn, Crediton, Newport (Mon.), Portsmouth (High-street), South Shields, and Sunderland. Grants have been made for special services and lectures at Bath, Braintree, Ipswich, and Norwich; for summer services at Douglas, Harrogate, Hollymount, and Windermere; for repairs to buildings at Derby, Newcastle (Staffs.), Shrewsbury, Sidmouth, and South Shields; for a new building at Ilford. The total amount of these various grants was nearly £600. Visits to congregations have been made by members of the committee, by the secretary, and by special preachers. The Rev. John Page Hopps has recently completed a series of missionary meetings and services at Ansdell, Blackburn, Blackpool, Chorley, Kendal, Lancaster, and Preston, where large and interested congregations have attended, both on week-days and Sundays.

The Rev. E. W. Sealy, M.A., formerly of the Church of England, is settled as minister of the newly formed congregation at Blackburn, and the Rev. Arthur Golland M.A., at Newport (Mon.). At Cambridge the Sunday morning services for students and others have been continued, the attendance remaining about the same as in previous terms. The expense is considerable, but the committee are convinced that the work is well worth doing.

The committee were invited by the National Triennial Conference to give their views concerning advisory committees and a ministerial settlements board. They are of opinion that one advisory committee for the South of England, another for the North of England, with special arrangements for Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, would be quite sufficient to deal with the limited and occasional work required. These committees, in the opinion of the executive committee, should be constituted of persons representing the various district societies. Neither a central board nor a small central committee is advisable or necessary. The advisory committees could exchange information and arrange to work on similar lines. While it would probably be impracticable to impose an educational standard, it is important that every possible means should be adopted to ensure educational efficiency. It is highly desirable to continue calling the attention of congregations to the risk incurred in inviting unknown men to occupy pulpits.

With regard to the settlement of ministers, the committee pointed out that the Association and the district societies deal from time to time with a considerable number of ministerial settlements. In regard to the general question, the experiments now being made by the ministerial fellowship should be left undisturbed until sufficient time has elapsed to test and weigh the results, before devising any new plans.

Work in Scotland.

One of the Unitarian vans was placed at the disposal of the Scottish Unitarian Association during the months of June, July, August, and September. Ninety meetings for adults were held, besides a number of children's meetings. The attendances averaged 358; at Renfrew about 2,000 were present. Nearly 16,000 Unitarian tracts were distributed. Interviews were held with a large number of inquirers. The Rev. E. T. Russell is of opinion that seventy-five per cent. of the people were in sympathy with the teachings of the missionaries.

Special lectures and services were held at Aberdeen, Dundee, Edinburgh, and Glasgow. The Rev. Frank Walters is engaged in lecturing and preaching at various places in Scotland from October to December. Religious services, following courses of week-evening lectures, have been held at Govan by the Rev. E. T. Russell; congregations of working men have attended. Lectures at Coatbridge and other centres have been arranged. Large numbers of Unitarian books and tracts have been circulated among religious inquirers in Scotland, and grants have been made to public libraries

Foreign Mission Work.

It is now eighteen months since Dr. Tudor Jones commenced his ministry at Wellington, New Zealand, and the evening attendance has never flagged. At the first of a series of sermons on "New Investigations of Scholars concerning Jesus and Christianity" the hall was crowded to the doors with about 400 people, including the Mayor and other prominent men in the city. While on a visit to Wellington, President Dr. Starr Jordan, of Leland Stanford University, conducted the service at the Unitarian Church; hundreds were present and numbers could not gain admission. A bazaar has been held in aid of the building fund and £250 realised, bringing the fund up to £600.

Acting for the Association, Dr. Tudor Jones, accompanied by Mrs. Jones, visited Dunedin and Christchurch, where he lectured and conducted Unitarian services. Much enthusiasm was shown, especially at Dunedin. There were 200 present at the first lecture, and 250 at the second, although the weather was very stormy. Several University students were present and expressed sympathy with the work. Pamphlets for free distribution were placed on a table and 400 copies disappeared in a few minutes. Sympathisers and those ready to help in the movement were asked to give in their names, and a large number of men and women did so. Mrs. Jones is starting Postal Mission work at Dunedin.

Sunday services were held at Christchurch in the afternoon, when 200 were present, and in the evening the hall was crowded. Lectures were given on the three following evenings; as the weather was bad the attendances were smaller but included several ministers.

The Rev. F. Sinclair, M.A., who studied at Manchester College, Oxford, has settled as minister at Melbourne. It is hoped to send a Unitarian minister to Adelaide shortly, where there is an excellent opportunity for work.

A grant of £10 has been made towards the expenses of a series of special services to be conducted by Mr. M. Jochumsson in Iceland. A small grant has been made towards the expenses of Unitarian services in Hamburg which Rev. Gardner Preston proposes to hold.

Mr. Shinde, of Bombay, reports that the past year has been the most successful since the Postal Mission work was started. The number of readers had very largely increased. He had lately engaged in a missionary effort to reach the depraved and neglected classes, a work he had been inspired to undertake by what he had seen of domestic missionary work in England. Mr. Chakrabarti reports that good work is being done by Rev. D. Edwards and others at the Khasi Hills Mission stations, in spite of difficulties caused by the attitude of Mr. Kissor Singh.

Mr. Toyosaki, of Tokio, reports that his Japanese translation of Dr. Herford's tract, "Main Lines of Unitarianism," has been published and circulated throughout the country with good results, several letters of inquiry in regard to it having been received.

Deceased Members.

Since the last meeting of the Council the committee deeply regret to report that death has removed from the list of its members Mr. William Wallace Bruce, Rev. Walter Lloyd, Rev. F. W. Stanley, and Mr. A. W. Worthington. The Association has lost in the death of Mrs. E. J. Nettlefold, of Birmingham, one of its most generous and steadfast supporters. Other valued supporters have died, including Mrs. H. C. Briggs of Windermere, Mrs. W. H. Herford of Paignton, Miss Pinnock of Newport, I.W., Miss Catherine Smith of Eccles, and Rev. W. W. Robinson of Gainsborough. To the relatives and friends of the deceased the committee would tender, through the Council, their respectful sympathy.

[At the close of the meeting news of the death of the Rev. William James reached the members, too late to bear testimony to the great services he had rendered to Unitarianism in South Wales.]

The Co-operative News prints the following correspondence (some years old) between Samuel Laycock, the Lancashire poet, and Robert Collyer:—

To the once Yorkshire blacksmith, now parson, I send
This book through a hint dropped by Elliott, our friend,
Who ventures to hope you may find in these rhymes
Some thought that may wake up old scenes and old times.

You began at the anvil, and I at the loom—

Our pathway in those days was shrouded with gloom;
But we toiled on in patience, kept pegging along,
Till our pathway to-day gleams with sunshine and song.

In due time Robert Collyer sent Laycock a copy of "Talks to Young Men" and the following lines ("I enclose a screed of rhyme tha may like to see"):

Dear Sammy, we heerd o' thee mony a time

As a man wi' a gift for a bit of good rhyme,

But I never expected a book fra' thy hand

Full of gooid things like these, about t'owd motherland.

Wi' ta tak' in return this poor thing fra' my pen,

For no reason but this, that I did it mesen'?

It's prose, to be sewer, but it's honest and trew:

Nay, I'm not sewer I made it; I reckon it grew

Same as thine, that's so full o' fine natural things,

Nobbut I mun just talk while tha muses and sings,

And sets folks a'laughin' and cryin' e' one,

And then stoppin' to wonder how i' t' warld it were done.

May owd Lancashire thank thee, and Yorkshire be jollier

As tha sings, is the wish o' thy friend,

ROBERT COLLYER.

Done on t' Isle of Manhattan, this 14th o' March,

When t' buds are just swelling on t' maple and larch.

OBITUARY.

THE LATE WILLIAM WALLACE BRUCE.

THE deeply lamented death of Mr. Bruce removes one of our most respected laymen from our midst, and calls for a brief obituary notice.

William Wallace Bruce was born at Hampstead on January 18, 1846, and had reached, therefore, his sixty-second year. He was the third and youngest son of Henry and Mary Bruce, his father being a man of high moral courage, and his mother a woman of fine thought, a sister of Anna Swanwick. Coming from an ancient and historic family, he was proud of his Scotch descent and name, and could claim an inherited sympathy with the cause of civil and religious liberty, since his ancestors were banished from Scotland for opposing the reintroduction of Episcopacy. More than one divine has nobly distinguished the annals of his family, and many others of its members have been known both to political and religious history. He loved Scotland intensely, knew its romantic story thoroughly, and could recite from Ossian and Scott freely, and with keen enthusiasm. He was educated at University College School, and later at University College, where a memorial tablet to his elder brother Alexander tells of a brilliant medical career cut short by an early death. Of University Hall he was a life member, and the removal of his name from its distinguished list will be sadly missed by his living contemporaries. Our churches owe more than they can tell to the high-minded and finely trained laymen who have passed on the noble traditions so well which they learned at University College and University Hall.

His father died in 1864, and in 1865 he left home to study at Lausanne for a year prior to entering upon a business career. Here he imbibed his first love for Switzerland, which was henceforward to provide for many years his delightful summer holidays. Being always a keen and intimate lover of nature, and also an untiring walker, he took with friends many knapsack tours, traversing the passes and wandering among the heights of the Swiss and Italian Alps. But he preferred the cloud panoramas of Scotland to the harder blue skies of Switzerland.

On leaving Lausanne, he first entered the office of a Calcutta merchant in the City, then gained some shipping experience with Lamport & Holt, and ultimately became a partner in an old-established firm of Mediterranean merchants. Twenty-five years of business gave him an intimate acquaintance with finance, together with a command of business methods, which he was to turn afterwards to public use; it also gave him sufficient success to enable him to retire from business and devote himself to the public service.

It had long been his wish to study at close quarters the economic and social conditions of the Metropolis, and his first social work was with Canon and Mrs. Barnett, when he helped to organise at Toynbee Hall one of the earliest of the long series of picture exhibitions. This connection with East London led to his standing for the second London County Council, and he was elected in 1892 as a Progressive member for Bow and Bromley, the most easterly constituency. Thus a new and great work now became the object of his life, and absorbed an ever-increasing amount of his time and thought; for he took his position seriously and was interested warmly in the welfare of his constituency, no less than in the general amelioration of London. This is no place either to praise or abuse the work of the London County Council, but no work is in nearer contact with the life of the people, and no work can exact more unremitting mental toil.

This toil Mr. Bruce did not shirk, but took a very active part in London Government, giving his best labours to two important committees. For fifteen years he was a member of the Finance Committee, and took a responsible part in shaping its policy, being twice chairman and for many years vice-chairman under Lord Welby. He was also, for the same period, a member of the Housing Committee, being chairman during half this time, and helping to clear away many a London slum. The largest and latest of the Council's lodging houses, Bruce House, is named after him. He also served at various times on the Parliamentary, General Purposes, Rivers, and many minor committees, and represented the Council on the Lee Conservancy Board, and Coborn Schools at Bow.

In his working-class constituency, with its population of eighty thousand, the demands upon him were many and great, but the people were loyal and enthusiastic. They returned him with large majorities at four successive elections, until March last, when the opposition of socialist candidates split the vote, so that he and his labour colleague lost the day by a small majority. That he felt this defeat deeply would be idle to deny, for it meant a complete break with the work of his life and a final severance from the Council to which he had given so much.

But, after a short holiday in Italy, he was keen to take up fresh duty, and accepted an invitation gladly to join the reconstituted Board of University College Hospital. He also became a Hibbert Trustee, and remained on the Committee of the Passmore Edwards Settlement, which he had supported from the outset. Indeed he was looking forward to a happy mingling of good work in London and recreation with his children, especially in the new Scotch home in Argyllshire, where the sea and mountains gave him inexhaustible delight.

His chief relaxation for over thirty years had been with the Volunteers, he having joined the famous Artists' Corps as a private in 1865, and thence passed through every rank to that of Lieutenant-Colonel before his retirement in 1896, with the long-service decoration. He used to recall with pleasure how he served as captain under Sir Frederic Leighton, for whom he had a warm admiration, and amongst other members of the corps were, or had been, Watts, Millais, Holiday, Richmond, Poynter, Severn, and Long. He put into his volunteer work the same thoroughness which marked all he did. No trouble was too great, and no detail too insignificant; he never went to a drill, as captain or field officer, without a carefully thought-out idea for making the best possible use of the time for the men under him.

His holidays in later years were spent almost entirely with his family, riding with his daughters, cycling, walking, boating. He never needed amusement other than the delights of scenery or the associations of local history.

His practical interest in our churches in London should here need no mention. In 1905, despite his arduous Council duty, he accepted the presidency of the Provincial Assembly and attended regularly every committee. On his re-election he brought forward suggestions for the consolidation of the Assembly's efforts, and he was at all times ready, with Mrs. Bruce, to attend meetings of the churches. He will be missed sorely. To his own congregation, Essex Church, his death is a simply irreparable loss, for he was not only the chairman of its committee, but the trusted friend of everybody. On the last Sunday in London before his vacation he took a class in the afternoon Sunday-school, although his health had already begun to fail, and rest was needful. He was also a member of the National Conference Committee, and our movement of liberal thought has lost a strong adherent.

In a wider circle he was respected by all, and he treated all equally in the same kindly way, for he knew the secret of true courtesy. His loss to his friends is too keen to be soon forgotten; the loss in his home is greater than words can convey or mind imagine. In 1885, he married a daughter of Mr. T. Fielding Johnson, of Leicester, and he leaves a family of six daughters. He died at his house, 9, Airlie-gardens, at noon on Sunday, October 20.

A memorial service took place at Essex Church on the following Thursday, October 24, when a large and deeply moved congregation filled the building. Many representatives were present from the Council, the Artists' Corps, political associations, and other public bodies, together with private relations and friends.

Two hymns were sung, "O God, our Help," and "Lead, Kindly Light."

The Rev. Frank K. Freeston spoke as follows:—

"When God calls good men back to Himself, we know not quite whether to speak, or be silent. Speech seems so powerless to express our deepest feelings; silence seems so cold and callous. Yet there are some things which can only be said truly when the hush of death stills all reply. We take men for granted when living, or do not fully realise to ourselves our hidden admiration; but when they are gone and with too sudden warning, we find then that we have owed to them more than we have ever known.

"We have assembled in this church to pay our last regards to a man, not of words, but of ideas and deeds, one who never courted personally either praise or publicity, but preserved before the world, and to the end, his innate modesty. It is because of this, and not otherwise, that we cannot keep quite silent to-day.

William Wallace Bruce served his time and place with a pure singleness of purpose which rebukes all praise. Setting aside the gains of business in the midday of his success, he chose as his sphere of voluntary labour a work more needed than any other, and one second to none greater. For fifteen faithful years, and to the fulness of his powers, he gave himself without stint or reward to the London he loved, and the people whom he served. Accepting the most onerous duties and responsibilities, acting on the most important and difficult committees, he was one of those splendid, solid workers behind the scenes who came less into prominent notice than many others with lesser records. And he kept himself unspotted throughout from those temptations to self-interest which so insidiously beset the path of public life. Into the details of that work and its lasting result it is needless here to enter. Its story is written in enduring brick and stone in the better and healthier dwellings for the poor of London.

"But we are proud to remember this morning the spirit in which his work was done. Few men, if any, can have done their duty to their city and their country with more entire fidelity and more singular constancy. None can have acted from a higher motive of public trust and responsibility. And so he gained through this splendid record the fullest respect and esteem of all about him, and they came implicitly to rely on his wise judgment and his true philanthropy. He was too independent in thought and action to ever become a partisan, and the most touching tributes on his decease have been those of his opponents. He was too thorough and conscientious to be content with less than his best, and so, whilst others were taking their pleasures, he was devoting his leisure hours to the public service. He was too full of first-hand knowledge to parade it at large, but to be taken by him through any part of London was a liberal education. And hence, though denied the recognition of highest office, he gained the truer appreciation of everyone who really knew him. 'An honourable, lovable gentleman' is the perfectly simple, genuine opinion of the working men of East London. Yes, for he was never too busy to be courteous, nor too hurried to do a kindness.

"Yet we should miss the secret spring and source of all this devoted usefulness if we forgot for one moment that he was a man of faith. Religion mattered to him—mattered much. He was the honoured chairman of this Church, twice President of its Provincial Assembly, and a valued member of its National Conference committee. But he could appreciate the best in other churches, and even worship with profit at their services. Indeed he belonged to the Church Catholic. He desired no sect, and he deplored all sectarian spirit. He was a Christian in the broadest and best sense of that term.

"Of his home life—that best part, and truest test, of any man's worth—I must not here speak. But we bear tenderly on our hearts to-day one who was his most loving helpmeet in every good work, and our own poorer lives take on a deeper consecration when we think of two hearts so entirely devoted, so nobly united—and now, by death so divided. I would express in your name the respectful sympathy of this large congregation for all the family in their affliction.

"He did not live in vain, for his works do follow him.

"We thank God and praise His holy name for all good men, and for our hope in the Life Everlasting.

“O strong soul, by what shore
Tariest thou now? For that force
Surely has not been left vain!
Somewhere, surely, afar
In the sounding labour house vast
Of being is practised that strength,
Zealous, beneficent, firm!

Fervent, heroic, and good,
Helper and friend of mankind.
And we, as we think of your life,
‘Strengthen the wavering line,
Stablish, continue, our march
On to the bound of the waste,
On to the City of God!’”

The interment was at Highgate.

A friend of Mr. Bruce's, who had known him from his boyhood, writes as follows:—

Mr. Bruce's death has brought a mass of testimony, public and private, to the high value of his public services, his integrity, his judgment, his industry, and impartiality. It is naturally by his public work that he is known, and it is of that that the public thinks. But there must still be many readers of THE INQUIRER whose thoughts go back to the surroundings and influences in which his conception of life and duty were formed, and to which he must doubtless have attributed much of what was best and strongest in him. His father was a man of tried courage and integrity, sagacious and successful in business, a man of few words, and not prominent in public life. Yet, in some respects, he held views which would even now be regarded as advanced, and only a few years ago would have been thought revolutionary. The whole instincts of his nature rebelled against the idea that the earth on which we stand should be the private property of any man. He had elaborated no theory of Land Nationalisation and was not a man to define or expound any elaborate social or political programme, but I have heard Miss Anna Swanwick, his sister-in-law, relate how he would speak sometimes of property and its rights, and then would stand still and strike his stick upon the ground saying, “But the land, you know, Anna, the land.” The inference seemed to him self-evident. His wife long survived him, and the generation that grew up after his death were still familiar with her gracious and beautiful presence, the freshness of her life-interests, her sympathy with new movements, even in extreme old age, and her steadfast zeal for civil and religious freedom. She shared the literary tastes and gifts of her family, and I shall never forget the privilege, when a raw boy at school, of spending an Easter holiday under her roof. William Bruce was then about fourteen. Fechter was in his first and best period, and Mrs. Bruce read and expounded “Hamlet” to us, in preparation for witnessing his wonderful embodiment of the character. It is a deathless memory, and one that in my mind will always be associated with the house (as it then was) in Albert-terrace. Miss Anna Swanwick, always in closest relations with her sister, was in the fullest sense part of the family, and all her wide range of social, political, religious, and literary enthusiasms and achievements, and her wide circle of distinguished acquaintances were part of the inheritance of her nephews and nieces. It would seem impossible that the world should ever appear common-place or vulgar to those who had seen it through these channels.

There was another influence which no one who remembers the old days at all can forget. It was that of William's elder brother, Alexander, the brilliant medical student, who, after winning all the honours that his College and University had to offer, standing with completed preparation on the very threshold of his chosen career, fell stricken by fever. A medallion in University College records the sense of loss of his professors and fellow-students; a well-known volume of selected verse is his mother's “Offering” to his memory; a memorial window in Hampstead Chapel to his father, eldest sister, and himself may occasionally prompt a question from the generations that knew him not; but his rare and beautiful spirit, and the life which seemed to be cut off in its full promise, but yet was already rich in performance, have their true monument in the hearts of those whom they touched and purified, deepened, stimulated, and exalted, and not least, we may be sure, in those of his surviving elder, and just deceased younger, brothers.

A still wider circle of the readers of THE INQUIRER will remember William Bruce as one of the younger members of the group privileged to meet for days of thoughtless but fruitful merriment, in the summer at Barmouth or elsewhere, in the winter at the loved house at Whittington, near Chesterfield, under the genial and courteous hospitality of the late Frederick Swanwick. “Golden days,” indeed, were those. Pagets, Huttons, Swanwicks, Lup-ton, Wicksteeds, Biggs, Boyds, and I know not how many more, look back upon the merry-making over which Frederick Swanwick beamed, as amongst the most precious and permanent stores in their treasure-house of memories. It would be a curious psychological problem to inquire whether any one who had been intimate in this circle could ever, under any circumstances, become a genuine cynic. Beyond the decent and orderly Sunday progress, week by week, to the chapel at Chesterfield, there was little in the way of expressed recognition of what men call the “higher life”; but I wonder how many preachers, missionaries, agitators, or reformers have done as much to purify and beautify the lives and ideals of those whom they have influenced as Frederick Swanwick did. High and pure motives, kindly feelings, and perfect fidelity to duty, were of the very atmosphere of the house. Simplicity and abundance were the characteristics of its hospitality. And, as Wordsworth tells us that the beauties of nature amongst which he spent his heedless boyhood, though unnoticed at the time, were, nevertheless, burnt into him, as it were, for ever, by the delight of the sports with which they were associated; so the character of the host and hostess at Whittington, felt only as delightful in those almost delirious days of skating, riding, and what not, were secured by the joy with which they were associated, for the after-reflection to which they became august. William Bruce had another and yet more intimate reason for blessing Whittington memories, for it must have been there that he was introduced to the family from which in after years he won his bride.

REV. W. W. ROBINSON.

WE regret to have to record the death on October 20, of the Rev. William Wynn Robinson, of Gainsborough. Born at Kendal, in 1833, Mr. Robinson entered the Unitarian Home Missionary College in 1854, and became minister at Merthyr Tydfil in 1858, subsequent pastorates being at Battle, Stockton-on-Tees, and Walsall. His connection with the Gainsborough congregation began in 1875 and only terminated with his death. A local writer says:—

Although he has worked in our midst for over thirty years few, if any, can realise the breadth of good deeds done by him. His ever present thought was to do something to alleviate the troubles and sufferings of those in distress. By acts of self denial and charity he has endeared himself to all with whom he came into contact. To some few it is known how frequently he has denied himself the bare necessities of life in order to feed or clothe some starving family. His purse was ever open to all who required help, and never did he refuse to extend the hand of friendship to those who were in need. Those who were privileged to enjoy his friendship can tell how his thoughts were always concentrated on the elevation and upraising of his poorer brethren. Whenever a good project was mooted in this district he was always one of the first to give it his support. He never waited to see what others would do, but at once took it up with a zeal which was one of his chief characteristics. For public approval he cared not a whit; if satisfied that a particular step was the right one, he would take it. At the bedside of many of the sick amongst us his presence will be much missed. His chief relaxation was, perhaps, music in all its branches. There was probably no musical instrument that he could not play, and yet he was almost entirely self-taught. When a boy of 14 he bought his first violin entirely out of his savings. Whilst at Walsall he formed a powerful Philharmonic Society, and got up numerous big concerts. He was always seeking out musical talent, and many a musician owes his skill to his powers of instruction. In connection with his school at Gainsborough he organised a successful orchestra, and in every way in his power encouraged the development of musical talent. For many years he played a viola in the orchestra at the Handel Festival. One of the best read men in this town, his memory respecting books and their authors was bewildering. Temperance education in all its branches and temperance work numbered him amongst their warmest supporters. Just a year ago, realising in Morton the need for a reading room for the lads of the parish, he bought a building and entirely at his own expense transformed it into a Lads' Club. Night after night throughout the winter he was to be found there playing on his violin, reading, or in many other ways contributing to the lads' pleasure. His work for the Co-operative Society is well-known. He was one of the principal supporters of the Co-operative Women's Guild, thereby carrying on the good work inaugurated by his late wife. He was an active supporter and one of the promoters of the local branch of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and was formerly a member of the Board of Guardians. At the time of his death he was a member of the Morton Parish Council, and at one time he was secretary of the Allotments Committee. He educated Mr. Foster Fraser, who was the son of a brother Unitarian minister. His wife predeceased him nine years ago and he leaves four daughters, the eldest being Miss Winifred Robinson, one of the most gifted violinists of the day.

THE REV. WILLIAM JAMES, J.P., LLANDYSSUL.

A GREAT loss to our cause in South Wales results from the death of the Rev. William James, B.A., J.P., which occurred at Llandyssul on Saturday last. Although not in pulpit service himself, for many years he maintained the deepest interest in the diffusion of Unitarian thought. He was Secretary of the South Wales Association, and Editor of its monthly organ Yr Ymofynydd. We hope to give an account next week of his long and honourable career.

THE Rev. H. E. Dowson is to visit the West of England on Tuesday next, when he will take part in the introduction service at Bridport of the new minister, the Rev. W. L. Tucker. It is hoped that this short notice may enable many friends to attend on this important occasion.

THE MINISTERIAL FELLOWSHIP.—The Autumnal Conference was held at Essex Hall, London, on Friday, 25th ult., the President, Rev. Charles Roper, in the chair. At a preliminary meeting for members only, some discussion took place about the Settlements and Supply Bureau, and steps were taken towards representation of Southern members on the committee. An open conference followed, to which all the ministers in the Provincial Assembly of London and the S.E. Counties were invited. Various matters of interest were considered and discussed, inquiry being made about the financial basis of the society. It was explained that a quinquennial actuarial valuation was necessitated by the Constitution, and the actuary on the last occasion had reported so favourably that, on his authority, the amount of benefit to members between pastorates had been slightly increased. Seventeen members had received benefit in this way, to which, by their subscriptions they were entitled, and 13 grants had been made from the Auxiliary Benevolent Fund. The secretary, Rev. C. J. Street, made a statement as to differences and resemblances between Ministerial Societies in the United States and in England, and the greetings of the American Ministerial Union were conveyed to the meeting. Rev. Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter added a few encouraging words, in which he cordially commended the work and purposes of the Fellowship, and expressed his desire for its progress and extension.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE BIRD IN THE CAGE.

ON one occasion Don Esparto and I had taken a walk together until we came to the sea coast. We sat down by a bank near the edge of the cliff and gazed at the boundless Atlantic, at the great woolly clouds, and at the sea-gulls wheeling before us. The nesting period was over, the young birds were on the wing, and though scarce three months old, looked quite as big, if not bigger than their parents. The latter were beginning to moult. As one flew past a little mist of a feather was loosened from under her wing and floated out on the air. But not for long. A swallow had spied it, was down upon it like a cruiser after a prize at sea, and carried it off in its bill to add to the lining of its nest.

"What a glorious life of liberty!" I exclaimed.

"I will tell you a fable," said the Don, in his usual sedate manner.

"There are multitudes of different kinds of birds in the world, but there is not one which is not distinguished by some peculiar beauty. Here, and also in foreign countries, I have observed many of them. I have taken special note of their plumage, their modes of flight, their songs and cries, and their various habits of nesting and acquiring their food. In this respect it has been a gratifying reflection to me that He who endowed me with the spirit both of observation and of compassion, had admitted me into the fellowship of the kindest soul of whom history bears record; him, I mean, who said, 'Consider the fowls of the air.' They are comrades, and I might say, children to the traveller in every land, if he will have them so. But I am rambling. Amongst all these creatures, some so pleasing in the pattern of their dress, some engaging—may I not say entrancing in the quality of their music?—and all worthy of studious attention in their bodily structure and in the ways in which they apply their intelligence, there is one which surpasses all the rest in its beauty and its various powers. What is its native country, from which it originally came I am not able to say. The problem has baffled the keenest research. The bird may now be found anywhere between the tropics and the poles."

"What is its name?" I inquired.

"That I will tell you presently," he said, and continued:—"The bird, you must know, is not free."

"Do you mean that it is a caged bird?"

"I do," said Don Esparto, "and in connection with that are certain matters of interest to which I will refer. The cage is of singular construction. It is made of the very best materials which could be obtained or invented for the purpose, and though it is but a small domicile at first—which is as much as the fledgling requires, it can, without any damage either to the appearance or solidity of the structure, be enlarged and expanded up to a certain point. The work requires the nicest art, but, given the proper skill, it may be managed with perfect success, and the structure becomes much more capacious and stronger than in its primitive form. This interesting subject is rightly considered of vital importance to the inmate, and it has engaged the thought of the wisest minds.

Sometimes the cage is neglected and allowed to fall into a state of disrepair; or, a common fault, sufficient attention is not paid to the extension or strengthening of its parts. In other cases this is done in a clumsy and clownish fashion, so that the result is ridiculous to look upon. The bird within requires abundance of light, otherwise it cannot sing; yet I have seen cages built in so loutish a way, with such thick and ugly bars that the daylight and fresh air were almost totally excluded. In that event, the bird becomes dull and morbid, sits on its perch like an owl in a barn, and become subject to a multitude of diseases. But if a choice art be exerted continuously upon the edifice until it has reached its full dimensions, it may and often does become a creation of such marvellous beauty as to excel all other achievements of human handicraft. Such a result, too, has the most gratifying effect upon the beautiful creature it encloses, serving to impart to it its own grace and stability, and to invite the emergence of wonderful and unsuspected qualities; while, like flies that flee from the sweet odour of lavender, the evil humours which infect the inhabitant of the neglected cage leave it.

"The bird is at first, of course, like all nestlings, a frail, dependent creature, but as it grows its plumage becomes very rich and delicate. The silver heron, and the bird of paradise have not more finely woven mantles. At the same time, its darker and more general feathering are a fitting garment for a being which, when its powers are mature, surpasses the eagle in dignity, as it does in its strength and the lofty adventure of its flight. While taking so kindly to its cage, that so long as it is vigorous it will not willingly leave it, it resents imprisonment in the rooms of houses, and attains its best where it can breathe the pure air and enjoy with its amazing vision the full extent of the landscape. It is in such circumstances only that the bird may be truly known. Then is it a joy to watch and listen to, for it breaks into sweet and valorous song, and seems to recreate in its chant the elements of the world around. Indeed, one may take it that this is a prime object of its being. Is the sky blue and the mead full of flowers, and the children at play therein, it emits a melody of gentle affection which seems to mean the same thing. But if a storm is brewing, or crowds of men are hastening by to their daily toil, or soldiers marching to battle, it accompanies them with a great passion of sound. When it is the victim of disease it becomes exceeding vicious; but when it is in sound and wholesome mood its disposition is so tender that the sight of any kind of creature in pain draws from its breast notes of soothing and compassion; and this I know to my own great solace.

"Only after it has reached the full height of its powers—it is a grievous mistake if it happens before—the door of the cage is set open, or the bird will rend its own passage, and taking wing vanish at once from sight in the depths of the sky.

"Such is my fable," said Don Esparto; "and now I will tell you the name of the bird—it is the soul of man, and the cage is the body in which for awhile it dwells, at the proper season taking that flight of freedom which we call death."—H. M. L.

ALL SOULS' DAY.

It is nearly a thousand years, the chroniclers say, since the monks of Clugny set the example of assigning November 2, the day after All Saints', to intercession on behalf of All Souls. The story that a pilgrim in far lands had been shown a momentary glimpse into Purgatory and saw the writhing forms of the sufferers under discipline there, is a typical one. Good Protestants, in whom excessive imaginativeness is a fault quite unknown, have a short way of dealing with such visions. So have the Rationalists, whose reasoning stops short of the future state. Sir OLIVER LODGE has just intimated again, on behalf of students of science, the difficulty, not of believing in the persistence of the principle of life, but of conceiving its annihilation. That is about as far as the man of prudence ventures to go. The mood that results is too hesitating to permit of ardent endeavour for the good of disincarnate humanity. With a whispered echo of the prophet's "All souls are Mine," the devout mind dwells in such content as it may.

The practical mind, however, observes that while, for the purposes of the prophet's special argument, the assertion holds good, there may be a misapplication of it. If in the Beyond there is no room for activities reaching out from our Hitherside, this cannot result from the divine ownership of all souls. For GOD owns all here too, yet here at least He commits to men the power to act for good or ill upon one another. To come to lowliest particulars, it is true in a sense that "all bodies" are His; and still we know that the care of bodies is not simply entrusted to us but actually thrust upon us. Citizen Sunday has once more been celebrated in hundreds of churches in London by calling the attention of the people who sit in the light of comfort to the people who sit in the darkness of dirt and degradation. We are our brothers' keepers, as to their bodies at least. If orare is not our modern method, laborare must be, otherwise we shall all suffer from the "filth diseases" that disgrace our civilisation. It would seem that All Souls are His in the same way—that, in fact, they are ours at the same time. Well for them and us that they are not ours only.

The value of the assurance that an Eternal Keeper claims us all, in whatever stage of being we be found, lies in the support it affords to our lowly efforts for the good of one another, or, if our efforts slacken, in the rebuke it gives. If we serve the humblest we serve the Highest, and if we sin against the humblest we sin against the Highest. Purgatory is all about us; we might be pardoned if sometimes we saw in its blackness an absolute Inferno. But since we have learned to look upon the universe as incapable of permanent schism, it being one as God is, we check our hasty despairs, and try to believe at least that all the misery of men and women and little children is disciplinary. Pilgrims going about our world's strange regions report to us in our happy valleys some of the horrors they have seen; we should be infinitely worse than the monks we ignorantly pity if a finer pity did not move us to do our best to end such pains and penalties. Some will pray, and some will work; some will do both.

In going on our way thus, one question may arise not unprofitably. Who knows whether he is more fitted to help than to be helped? The assumption that we observers, at any rate, are safe, seems to underlie much of our thinking and speaking. If this is deeply thought out, our case is a happy one. But is it so? Or while we look over the edge of the chasm and seem to see those others all but damned, is it really we who are in the worse state? There is a stony hardness of heart that wears the semblance of restful peace, and self-complacency that mistakes itself for trust in God. Through what cleansing fires must he pass whose sin is so subtly disguised that its sinfulness is hidden even from himself? Unitarians, Universalists, Liberal Christians, and the rest, are we so very certain of the ultimate fate of All Souls as to leave no room for anxiety on the immediate behalf of any? If we felt our own need more we should surely try more earnestly to lessen theirs.

MINISTER'S PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.—The half-yearly meeting of managers was held at Essex Hall, London, on Friday, 25th ult. A further sum of £142 5s. 10d., including donations and a legacy of £100 from the late Mr. Hodgson Pratt, was invested and added to the capital fund. The annual subscriptions promised for this year amount to £271, less than the £300 per annum asked for. The interest from investments amount this year to £769 19s. 8d. Four new applications from ministers were granted, and the total number of beneficiary members now is 87. Three have died and one withdrawn, since the Fund was established. A conditional promise of assistance was also made in the case of an aged minister contemplating retirement.

AFTER THE INTERNATIONAL. A LAST LINGERER.

THIS particular remnant of the visitors to the Boston International Congress may, perhaps, be allowed now to relapse into the first person. Dr. Hunter and Professor Montet are both on the Atlantic on their way home, and one or two others, if report speaks true, sailed from Boston on Tuesday (October 15). Mr. Webster, of Aberdeen, who preached at Buffalo on Sunday, is to sail at the end of the week.

It was my happiness to spend that Sunday (October 13) with the Gannetts at Rochester, to share the morning service with Mr. Gannett, and to preach for him. His people are sorrowful now that his ministry of eighteen years with them is to come to a close, for he has resigned, and a successor is being sought. In a joint letter to the congregation with regard to this, Mr. and Mrs. Gannett write (in the September-October Calendar):—"To answer kind inquiries, our resignation does not mean any serious break in health, nor the ceasing of work, nor leaving the city, nor any lessening, we trust, of old friendships—in many cases as old as the full eighteen years of our residence with you. You have long known that this thought was in mind, with only the right moment waited for. It seemed to us in the summer that that moment had come. The last year or two it has been increasingly hard to give full measure of work, and you ought to have the fresh inspiration that would come with a new face, a new voice, a new mind, and new methods, wisely chosen." And in some closing words of counsel as to the choice of a new minister, they add: "Choose by religiousness, by assurance of character, by desire for communal service—by attractiveness only if that be added to these. Choose the man whom you want for the best that is in you, and one you would want by your side in home-stress."

Mr. Gannett has felt the burden of his serious deafness, which has naturally made an active ministry more difficult, but no minister could be more beloved than he, or more revered in the city, where his public services and his personality have made a deep impression. For us in the old country, who have delighted in his hymns and poems for twenty years, and to whom his ministry has come through "Blessed by Drudgery," "A Cup of Cold Water," "I had a Friend," "The House Beautiful," and other golden words out of his rich store, whatever concerns him must be a matter of sincere and affectionate interest, and what we shall hope from this retirement will be that out of the leisure thus gained Mr. Gannett will soon be able to give us other books which will carry the gracious and quickening influence of his ministry further still, for the enrichment of many lives.

To see Mr. Gannett was one of the chief hopes with which I came to America. Another, that I might also see Mr. Hosmer, has not been fulfilled, for he did not come East for the International, but in his home at Berkeley in far away California, is busily engaged in the preparation of a course of lectures on Hymnology, to be delivered at Harvard next spring. To receive a message of greeting from him under Mr. Gannett's roof was a great pleasure. In former years, in the work of the Western Conference, of which Chicago is the centre, Hosmer, Gannett, and Jones were drawn very near to one another, as joint publications of theirs remain to testify, and it was no common privilege, first in Chicago and then in Rochester, to be allowed to come within the still unbroken circle of their friendship.

To Rochester I came from Meadville, by way of Niagara, and that seems already a long way off, though, as I write, it is less than a week since my two wonderful days there. I shall not commit the rashness of attempting to write about Niagara. The impression, especially as one stood close by the great fall on the Canadian side, was overwhelming. Apart from this and the glorious tumult of the rapids, both above and below the falls, what I like best now to recall are the autumn colours in the woods on Goat Island and the quiet sunshine there, even with that stupendous torrent close at hand, and the distant glimpse of the blue waters of Ontario as we came down the splendid Gorge route and saw the winding course of the Niagara river ending at last in the lake. At Rochester also there are falls by no means to be despised, in the Genesee river, which flows right through the city, and just below the city a fine gorge, where the river runs northward towards Ontario, with beautiful parks on either side. Rochester, in the heart of the best fruit-growing country of the Eastern States, has many charming roads, and Mr. Gannett's home is in a quiet nook of one of the most beautiful of them, amid gardens rich in singing birds. The city is fortunate in having a variety of industries, among the chief being that of the Eastman Kodak Company, while in matters of education it stands in the foremost rank.

Monday night (October 14) I came away from Rochester, and was to have been in Boston well before seven on Tuesday morning; but the train was just three hours late. The fact is that the goods traffic from West to East has increased to such an enormous extent, and so rapidly, that the railway companies just now seem quite unequal to the task of keeping time with their passenger trains. This once I did not seriously grudge the lateness, for, when I looked out of my berth long before sunrise, we were just entering the beautiful country of the Berkshire hills, in Western Massachusetts, and were not far from Lenox, where Channing died, though that was not on our railway line. The lateness, however, meant that on Tuesday afternoon I had another solitary journey of four hours and a half, northward, into New Hampshire, for my host and hostess, Dr. and Mrs. Crothers, had to take the morning train to their summer home (in the woods, right out of the world) so as to have time to settle in comfortably for the night.

That is where these lines are written. We three are here alone under the woodland roof for two or three rare days amid a perfect glory of autumn weather and clear moonlight at night, with gold and flaming red upon the maples, the shumac, the beech and birch, and other autumn trees, such as I have never seen before. Madison is the station, and Silverlake the post-office, but neither is where we are.

Chocorua is our great mountain (over 3,500 feet in height), upon which we look over the tree-tops of our wood, with other hills beyond, while to the left, still over the trees, is the range of the Ossipees, Whittier's favourite tramping ground. The whole district is just south of the White Mountains proper. It is a country which the westward tide of agricultural prosperity has left somewhat bare of people, irresponsible to the farmer, but glorious for the simple lover of Nature in her solitudes. Here seven years ago Dr. Crothers acquired acres upon acres of wild woodland, close to where Edward Cummings, who is co-pastor with Dr. Hale in Boston, had the year before bought an old farmhouse and more acres of the woodland. Not far off are other summer homes, Professor William James, of Harvard, being among the happy settlers; but each is really in solitude among its own trees, and within sight of Chocorua. Here Dr. Crothers built a little house, to which he and the members of his family have since been constantly adding, with true woodland skill and great ingenuity. The white columns of the silver birch, which abound, are used with much effect on the balconies and for interior decoration, and both ingenuity and poetic feeling have gone to make a very charming nest among the trees. The balconies in summer serve as dormitories, and even the open ground beneath the trees. Close by they have built an ideal guest-house, in the upper chamber of which there is inscribed, "Unto the pilgrim they gave a large upper chamber whose window opened towards the sunrise," while over the balcony, which looks out towards Chocorua and the other hills, one reads: "Then I saw in my dream, that on the morrow he got up to go forwards, but they desired him to stay till the next day also; and then, said they, we will, if the day be clear, show you the Delectable Mountains." These October days have been clear indeed, and of indescribable beauty—ideal days for resting after much travelling and speech. And here our friend of "The Gentle Reader" and "The Pardoner's Wallet," the minister of the First Church in Cambridge, appears under a new aspect—as a keen back-woodsman, with a passion for the wild country and the simple things of life. Would that I might transfer to this place a picture of the "happy warrior" of many an eager spiritual battle, at leisure here in the open country, in the frank enjoyment of labour and of idleness, in field or wood or about the house, digging, building, clearing the ground of stones, making a great fire at night to burn up the waste underwood, carrying water from the well, or tramping far afield. Just now, as I was writing outside, a pert little chipmunk, smaller than a squirrel, with its bright black eyes, and quaintly marked back, came out from among the stones and sat looking, almost within reach of my feet, but then darted off into shelter. It is the perfect solitude, and all the charm of the unspoiled woods, and the great sweep of the mountains, and the splendid air (here at the house, about 1,000 feet above sea-level)—and the clear lakes, embosomed among the trees, when one comes out along the shore, or looks down upon them from a height—the sense of being out of reach of anything but Nature, unless one tramps two miles down to the railway track—that make this settlement just what it is, with the people who have made it! And he is happy who comes to see.

This letter I suppose I shall chase on its way home; but first I must be in Cambridge and Concord again, and make a pilgrimage to the Whittier country on the way thither; and then a day in New York before I sail. The rest I will tell, if it seems worth while, when I get back.

V. D. D.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

Council Meeting.

THE Council met on Tuesday afternoon at Essex Hall, Mr. C. F. Pearson presiding, in the unavoidable absence of the President, Sir William Bowring. Those present included:—Rev. F. Allen, Mrs. Bartram, Miss Burkitt, Mr. E. Capleton, Rev. G. Carter, Mr. T. A. Colfox, Rev. F. K. Freeston, Mr. J. Harrison, Rev. J. Harwood, Mr. H. B. Lawford, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Mr. I. S. Lister, Miss Lister, Mr. J. Nield, Rev. J. A. Pearson, Rev. H. W. Perris, Mr. F. Pinnock, Rev. W. W. C. Pope, Miss Preston, Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. S. W. Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Rev. H. Rawlings, Rev. C. Roper, Miss E. Sharpe, Rev. T. P. Spedding, Mr. W. Spiller, Mr. Hugh Stanus, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Miss Tayler, Mr. S. S. Tayler, Rev. W. Wooding, Mrs. Wooding, and Rev. N. Jozan (Budapest).

The minutes of the meeting of March 26 were read and signed.

The SECRETARY reported the election of the new President and Council at the annual meeting in Whit-week, and then read the report of the Executive Committee (see p. 691).

A vote of condolence with the families of deceased members was passed in silence on the motion of the CHAIRMAN.

The Rev. T. P. SPEDDING reported on the Van Mission. He said there was reasonable ground for congratulation, as the figures would show. The four vans had held 423 evening meetings, besides midday and children's meetings, and, though the weather had greatly hindered at first, the average attendance was 290, or a total of over 122,000. The cost had not exceeded the estimate, but, in fact, the cost of supplying the pulpits of ministers taking part had been borne largely by the ministers themselves.

In the course of the discussion on the report which followed, the Rev. J. A. PEARSON (Oldham) asked if "theatre services" would be assisted this season; and the Rev. C. ROPEE (chairman of the Home Mission Committee) replied favourably. The Rev. N. JOZAN (Budapest) expressed his pleasure at being permitted to attend the Council and to exchange fraternal greetings. The SECRETARY, replying to a question by Miss SHARPE, said that grants of books had been liberally made to lay preachers, and it was intended to carry on this branch of the work.

The American Meetings.

The reports having been received, the Rev. J. HARWOOD welcomed home the British and Foreign Unitarian Association delegates to Canada and Boston; and moved a resolution expressing appreciation of the great services rendered to Liberal religious thought and work by the meetings of the International Council in Boston in September, and of gratitude for the generous hospitality extended to the delegates of the Association and to the visitors from Great Britain and Ireland.

Mr. PERCY PRESTON, in seconding the resolution, expressed his regret that he had not been able to attend on what he was sure was a most inspiring occasion.

The SECRETARY, in responding, said: It is impossible in a few words to convey any idea, to those who were not there, of the magnitude, variety, interest, and enthusiasm of the great meetings of the International Council at Boston. The preparations made by Dr. Eliot and Mr. Wendte, assisted by an eager band of helpers, were on a scale of generosity which surpassed anything "Unitarian" ever attempted on this side of the Atlantic. The illustrated literature, the guide books, the programmes—even the badges—were produced in such excellent form that few will desire to part with their possession. Upwards of 2,500 persons were enrolled as members, each paying the dollar fee.

The attendance at the various meetings, at some of which there were long papers and longer sermons, was a constant surprise. There were many instructive and valuable essays read; and it was noteworthy how very near men of different nationalities and church connections came to each other, not only in sympathy but also in thought, and even in expression. It was a further evidence that it is freedom alone that will lead to any real unity. In and about Boston there was no need to apologise for being a Unitarian; one was rather in danger of becoming too self-satisfied and proud of the fact. The session at Harvard, the visits to Concord and Plymouth, to Hingham and Fairhaven, were full of interest; and all the arrangements were carried out in the most delightful and generous way.

The delegates of the Association were received in public and in private with a kindness and hospitality which they are not likely soon to forget. We owe to the fact that we were delegates many special opportunities of social intercourse and friendship in which others were unable to participate, but it is a pleasure to report that those who were simply Unitarian visitors from England were delighted beyond measure at the courtesy shown them in America. About forty of our ministers had opportunities of preaching in Unitarian churches in America.

The delegation of Unitarians from Great Britain and Ireland was the largest that had ever crossed the Atlantic. Nearly all have now returned to their homes and their work. I believe we have been uplifted and cheered by our experiences; and, let us hope, inspired to do more and better work in our own land for the furtherance of pure religion in a spirit of perfect freedom.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT replied as to the visit to the churches in Canada. Nothing could exceed the kindness and warmth of the welcome they had received, and he believed that the congregations (whose history and condition he briefly sketched) would be stimulated by this token of interest and sympathy from the "old country."

Mr. H. B. LAWFORD and the Rev. W. W. CHYNOWETH POPE also responded, the latter stating that he had ventured to convey the greetings of British Unitarianism to churches in the Far West as well as to the friends at Winnipeg.

On the motion of the Rev. J. HARWOOD, seconded by Mr. S. S. TAYLER, it was resolved to send a letter of greeting to each of the Canadian churches.

The Rev. C. ROPER then read the following memorandum on the Grouping of Churches.

At the Conference of representatives of the various District Societies, held in London during Whit-week, the question of the grouping of various small congregations under one or two ministers was discussed. The general opinion of those present seemed to be that such a scheme was necessary in order to preserve several of our smaller congregations from extinction, and to provide larger and more varied fields of work for some of our ministers. Certain districts, owing to the wide distance apart of the congregations, render the adoption of a workable scheme extremely difficult. There are also, in some cases, local difficulties which are by no means easy to overcome.

The experience of many years' work has impressed upon the Committee the conviction that the policy of providing each little congregation with a minister all to itself is wasteful of resources and unnecessary. The committee have under consideration the preparation of a draft scheme showing how some of the smaller congregations might be linked up with larger congregations, and how others might be grouped under one or two ministers.

The district ministers and the committees of the various District Societies have been invited to submit practical suggestions towards the preparation of a draft scheme of the grouping of churches. Many interesting and valuable proposals have already been received; the committee will welcome the views of members of the Council on this difficult but very important question.

The Rev. J. HARWOOD expressed the opinion that the ministry would grow in efficiency if ministers had the stimulus of more work to do in connection with several small congregations instead of one.

Mr. F. PINNOCK said the Southern Association felt unable to apply the principle at present, owing, chiefly, to the large distances between their churches.

Mr. T. A. COLFOX said where grouping was possible it ought to be effected, and he held that the Association would be perfectly justified in laying down conditions, if thought advisable, before making their grants in aid.

The Revs. W. WOODING, W. W. C. POPE, H. RAWLINGS, and J. A. PEARSON also spoke in general support of the proposal, and the discussion ended with a few words of thanks by the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, on behalf of the Committee.

This concluded the business.

In Scribner's Magazine we find this Quatrain by W. F. Schmitz:—

"What then—your little candle-flame blown out,
And all the world in darkness for a minute?
Why even so? The stars still shine, no doubt,
Enough to strike a match by—and God's in it."

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

THE Assembly met on Thursday last week at Hampstead. The annual service took place in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, which was well filled. The Rev. W. J. JUPP, of Croydon, conducted the devotional portion of the service, and the preacher was the Rev. Professor L. P. JACKS, of Manchester College, Oxford. His sermon dealt with the situation brought about by the critical and philosophical tendencies of our age in the field of religion. Many minds felt that they had been "carried captive" into a "strange land" where they could no longer sing "the songs of Zion." His argument tended to show that, despite many necessary changes in religious thought and expression—changes that could only be postponed at the cost of reality in our worship—the essential verities of religion remained. In particular, there were forms of utterance in prayers and hymns still in use in our churches which presented a mood of anxiety for the safety of the individual worshipper to a degree no longer natural. A deep sense of solidarity had come into men's minds, and those antique types should be discarded in favour of others more in keeping with the newer thought. In conclusion, Professor Jacks said:—

"And now, may I ask, have I satisfied you that prevailing fears in this matter are groundless? That, perhaps, is too much to expect. I am aware that the whole attitude I have taken up is suspect in the eyes of many religious persons. Some of you may utterly disbelieve that the decay of religious emotion can be arrested by any mere idea, whether of Divine Immanence or anything else. What religion needs to-day is not more ideas, nor better ideas, but more simple piety and more of its spirit. Only thus can the heart maintain its life. As for all these vaunted ideas you press upon us, they are only so many fresh stumbling-blocks for faith. They complicate what is otherwise perfectly simple and make it harder for plain souls to find their way to God. What, therefore, you offer us as a safeguard for religious feeling is nothing but a new danger to that which you profess to guard.

"Will you be patient with me, then, if I offer yet another plea? All true piety is simple, but it is by no means the simplest thing of all. Impiety is simpler, and it is more common. For every simple soul whom you might find at this moment engaged in a humble act of prayer to God, it would be easy to find ten far simpler souls engaged in some less commendable occupation. These simplest souls of all, who seldom reflect, and who resist nothing so much as being compelled to reflect, will agree with you entirely when you pour contempt on the value of mere ideas. And if you go further, if you taunt the thinkers with having broken down in their task, if you tell them that the result of all their labour is that they have to leave the problems of religion just where they were, again these simplest souls will be on your side. That is just what they want to be on. Any reflection you may cast on the value of the thinker's work plays straight into the hands of those multitudes who are leading the most worthless and frivolous kind of life. May I beg you, then, not to plead the cause of simple piety in such a way as to leave all the advantage of your plea to simple impiety. Believe me that simple piety gains nothing from such pleadings. Simple impiety gains everything.

"And then I would ask you to remember something that is easily forgotten, and especially so in the hour of quiet communion with God. As you kneel in the quiet security of your inner chamber, give a thought, I pray you, to those distant and dangerous frontiers of the religious life where hordes of Goths and Huns, armed with the keenest weapons of the intellect, and marching under all the banners of irreligion, are continually seeking to effect an entry. Think kindly of the men who, in the midst of continual strife and peril, are guarding those frontiers on your behalf. Let the deepest utterance of your simple piety be just a prayer for them. Do not send them taunting messages that their warfare is a vain thing. Pray for them, for they need your prayers. O ye of the simple, trusting heart, it would be an evil day for you if those men were to desert their posts. The forces they are trying to beat off would not leave you alone if once they were suffered to enter in. They would not respect your simple piety. They would trample your shrines and desecrate the inmost altar of your heart; they would sweep you off to their Agnostic Babylons, and then indeed you would learn what it means to sing the Lord's songs in a strange land. Some of you, perhaps, do not need such a warning. There have been times, even in the history of your simple piety, when you have come to very close contact with the forces of which I speak. You, too, can remember the day when the enemy somehow managed to pass the guard; when he sailed his warships up your rivers and drowned your devotions with the thunder of his guns. Think kindly, I beg again, of the men to whom you owe it that this dreadful battery on your dearest faith has not been more frequently heard. Don't think of them as bursting with intellectual pride; their work is far too dangerous for that. There is not one of them who would not gladly exchange lots with you if he might. There is not one of them but knows that all you may go into the kingdom of heaven before he comes even in sight of the gates.

"If anything more were needed to strengthen my plea, there remains one final reason. All this talk about the breakdown of thought in the quest for God is simply and monstrosly false. It is my firm conviction, which I can only state now for what it is worth, but which I must state, that since religious thought began there has been no single movement of that thought which has failed in the long run to deepen the intimacy between man and God. This is the faith of the men who guard the frontiers, and pray God it may never weaken in their hearts! Their confidence in it was never greater than it is to-day. Those men are in good spirits, and if you of the simple heart could receive a message from them to-day, it would be to tell you that the things you love most and honour highest are safe. All is going well with them, and they know whom they serve. The great dangers lie nearer home. They lie not with those who think the most, but with those vast multitudes of simplest souls who are most averse to think."

BUSINESS MEETING.

After luncheon, which was numerously attended, the annual business meeting was held in the chapel, the President (Rev. F. H. Jones) in the chair. There was a large attendance of members and friends.

The roll of the assembly having been called by the Secretary, the PRESIDENT moved a resolution of regret and sympathy in connection with the death of Mr. William Wallace Bruce, president of the assembly 1904 to 1906. Mr. Bruce's services to the assembly, he said, were of the highest importance, but a far wider circle had benefited by his arduous and intelligent labours for the community as a member of the London County Council. The resolution was carried in silence, the whole assembly standing.

On the nomination of the PRESIDENT, the names of the Revs. W. Wooding and Lindsey T. Badcock were added to the roll of the assembly. The newly organised congregation at Ilford, having applied for enrolment, was formally admitted to membership.

The TREASURER (Mr. J. Harrison) then presented his statement of accounts. An examination of the balance sheets for the past five years showed that the amount raised by subscriptions was practically stationary; there had been a falling off in the collections. So far as the funds of the assembly were concerned the dependent congregations at Walthamstow and Brompton had not been a serious burden.

In the course of the discussion that ensued, attention was called to the supplementary aid by which alone the assembly's resources had been saved from serious deficit on account of these congregations, and it was resolved that the financial position be carefully considered and reported upon by the committee, with a view to bringing about a more satisfactory state of affairs.

The reports of the committee, the South-Western Sunday School Union, the Minister of the Assembly and the advisory committee, were presented and formally received.

The officers were re-elected as follows: President, Rev. F. H. Jones; treasurer, Mr. J. Harrison; auditor, Mr. J. S. Lister; secretary, Rev. F. Allen. The various committees were appointed.

In connection with the public questions committee, from which no report was presented this year in consequence of the lamented death of the secretary, the Rev. B. Kirkman Gray, some dissatisfaction was expressed. The PRESIDENT, in reply to several speakers, said that the committee had not been idle, but it was considered better to mature the work in hand among the congregations and report next year.

It was decided to accept the invitation of the Maidstone congregation to hold the Assembly there next year; the Rev. W. J. Jupp was elected Preacher, and the Rev. J. P. Hopps was elected Supporter, for 1908.

The Rev. J. HARWOOD, responding for "Kindred Societies," the representatives of which were welcomed by the PRESIDENT, spoke of the remarkable interest evoked by the visits of the Rev. J. Wood, president of the National Conference, to churches in different parts of the country, and commended the example of Mr. Wood's congregation in consenting to his undertaking this work. Mr. Harwood also emphasised the need for linking smaller congregations together, and trusted such steps as might be taken in this direction would meet with general approval.

The Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS, minister of the Assembly, in an interesting address, described the nature of the work committed to his charge. The smaller congregations in the province suffered much from isolation, and welcomed his visits with evident appreciation. He had charge of seven such congregations, in addition to general work for the province, and he bore testimony to the value of the services of lay preachers. But why did not the larger London churches supply recruits to their lay-preaching staff? He had taken share in the mission work of the Unitarian Van, at Ilford and Walthamstow, and he was glad to report that not only did the Van evoke enthusiasm on the part of those already attached, it had undoubtedly yielded no inconsiderable ingathering already. He thought the van work had been regarded with suspicion in some quarters, but he was convinced that it should be heartily welcomed as an agency for good.

Presidential Address.

The PRESIDENT then delivered an address on "Our Churches and Social Service," as follows:—

In addressing the provincial assembly of London and the South-Eastern counties, it is almost impossible for me to abstain entirely from a distinctly personal note, and I will therefore boldly begin with myself and my personal relation to the province and interest in it, so that I may the sooner dismiss myself and come to some of the larger aspects of our mission and work. It was in London and the South-Eastern counties, though there was then no Provincial Assembly, that my own ministry began, for though my settlements in the ministry were first in the Midland counties and then in Lancashire, it was in the old chapel at Bow that I preached my first sermon, and in Ditchling, Bessel's Green, Battle, and other congregations of the province that I continued to practice my unformed eloquence on patient country congregations, and at Little Portland-street that I had my first experience of superintending a Sunday school. All that was in my college days, but it was none the less the work of the ministry. When I returned to London, now 22 years ago, it was not to come among churches where I was a stranger, but to reconnect interrupted communion, and to take up again to some extent the same work. It fell to me to take up again for a time the superintendence of the same Sunday school, and I found myself at liberty to serve the same congregations. When the project of uniting the various congregations as constituent members of a Provincial Assembly was brought forward I was able to join it with enthusiasm, and whatever part I have had in the life and work of the Assembly has been a great privilege.

When, therefore, the assembly did me the honour, twelve months ago, to elect me President, that was in a sense the climax of a long series of steps, the first of which was taken when I preached my first and very immature sermon in the little chapel at Bow 42 years ago; and I was brought into special relations with the same group of churches in which I had worshipped and ministered at that time. But it imposed upon me new duties, and conferred upon me a new privilege.

In the exercise of the duties which you have imposed upon me, and the privilege which you have given me, I have, during the past year, visited 22 of the congregations of the assembly, sometimes preaching, sometimes speaking at a week evening meeting, sometimes merely joining in the ordinary Sunday service as a fellow worshipper, never with any intention of "inspecting," counting heads, or reporting to the committee or any one else, but always with the paramount desire to come into closer touch with the congregation, to converse with the minister, and to strengthen the links that unite us together in our common aims, and deepen the sense of unity and co-operation of spiritual life.

Religious communion is, as I understand it, itself the supreme purpose of an assembly of churches. Their organisation exists for the sake of the spiritual life. The exercise of the sense of fellowship in religion, the sense of universal brotherhood, and the impression and expression of a common religious life, and a common devotion to the supreme righteousness and love, are not a means to some material end, but are themselves the end and goal. So that when we have worshipped together in spirit and in truth we do not ask what good will this do us, for this is itself good. This I have felt in visiting the churches of our assembly. But, at the same time, I could not but be conscious of many defects and weaknesses. The smallness of our numbers in many places is itself a sign of weakness. Not that a small number of persons associated together for any purpose religious or otherwise is necessarily weak; but that if they be really strong, enthusiastic, with faith in their own principles and devotion to them, believing in God and in one another with all their hearts, and justifying one another's faith, really caring about the things they profess, and not letting other things take precedence and distract them and turn them away, then, because they are strong, their church will be strong and healthy, and being strong and healthy it will grow, and though small to begin with it will become large as well as strong, not by the passing attraction of some popular eloquence or startling philosophy or theology, but by the permanent attraction of character and life.

But a church, however strong, cannot, any more than an individual, live to itself alone. The men and women who sing together and pray together on the Sunday, are the same who work together and laugh together and weep together during the week, and so the church is concerned with all that goes on in the week, and awakens to the great duty of social service.

Even when the church despised the world she still desired to save the people, and now with a full recognition of the grandeur and glory of the world, and the possibilities of the triumphs of science in a world that is worthy of unlimited effort, comes a new wave of desire to save the people, so that in all sections of the universal church there are springing up guilds and societies and unions for social service. They will have to deal with all the problems of humanity, with all that affects the moral and spiritual life of man—and what is there that does not affect it? No guild or society can discharge to the full the duties of the service of man, that ignores the question of the training of the young or the care of the old and infirm, the treatment of the sick or the treatment of the criminal, the tenure of land or the relations of commerce, national or international, the question of temperance, or of social purity, or of commercial morality, our dealings with our fellow-men or our dealings with the dumb animals.

Looking back upon the past year, we cannot fail to be impressed by the number of Societies and Meetings, and Organisations throughout the country for the purpose of the careful study of these matters with a view to practical work of all kinds, from the saving of human life to the providing of window-boxes and flowers to brighten humble city homes.

It is to my mind one of the signs of the inexhaustible vitality of religion that in so many quarters the organisations for social service have sprung up in direct connection with church life and institutions.

I trust that our churches will not be found slothful or backward in any of the movements for the amelioration of the life of man; but I trust also that they will not lose sight of the end in pursuing the means, and that they will bear in mind that no amelioration of conditions and environment can avail anything for the life of man unless there be in man the life itself, the life of the mind and the spirit, the life of righteousness and love.

The question is raised from time to time, and especially in these days of organising and machinery—"With whom does the future lie?" Where are we to look among the churches for effective work? We are told that there is a coming great uprising and revival of the Anglican Church, that the Congregationalists have the future in their hands, that a great movement of the Ancient Catholic Church, with its headquarters in Rome, is to widen its doors and admit all shades of opinion in our great religious life, that our day as a small group of free churches is passing away.

My friends, the future lies with truth and righteousness and love, with faith and hope and charity. If we have these in our midst we shall have our share in the coming of the kingdom, and we will grudge no other church, or groups of churches, their share, but will rejoice with them in every good work, and hope that they also will rejoice with us.

EVENING MEETING.

This year it was decided that the evening meeting should not be, as usual, a public meeting appealing to the locality, but a Conference on some subject of interest to the churches of the Assembly. The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD kindly consented to read a paper on "Congregational Independence in a Co-operative Age." The President of the Provincial Assembly, Rev. F. JONES, took the chair at 6 p.m. in the Rosslyn Hill School-room, which was practically full.

Rev. J. WOOD said ours was an age of organised effort in many directions—commercial, industrial, social, and political. It was not to be expected that religious work would thrive in isolated endeavours. His recent visits to many of our churches made him painfully aware of their extremely weak condition, and, unless an organisation took shape among them similar to that which characterised modern life in so many directions, they must inevitably languish and die out. He had opposed Dr. Martineau's scheme twenty years ago, but experience and observation had since then convinced him, that if that scheme were not acceptable for various reasons, some scheme was imperatively needed. He did not wish, however, to be precipitate in bringing forward fresh proposals. What was first necessary was to create a public opinion favourable to such developments, and so make the way ready for a real step forward.

Mr. CHITTY (Dover) followed Mr. Wood, and gave an interesting speech expressing sympathy with much that Mr. Wood had said.

The Rev. A. A. CHARLESWORTH then spoke, saying that he was in favour of closer union among churches with a common aim and in general agreement. He denied that there was any real agreement among the various Churches of the National Conference. The "democratic movement" was the movement of the age, and if our churches could unite in sympathy with that he would welcome the union.

Mr. SMITH, of Brighton, agreed with Mr. Charlesworth, and wished it were possible for that Conference to move a resolution in connection with the threatened railway strike.

The Rev. H. GOW thought, if the "democratic movement" meant Socialism, that it could not and ought not to be the bond of union among the Liberal Christian Churches. He believed there was a bond of union, however difficult it may be to express, in the ideal of the Christ life.

Rev. P. PRIME pointed out that something was being done in uniting the churches of the Provincial Assemblies by arrangements which enabled ministers to exchange with one another without cost.

Rev. H. RAWLINGS spoke of the "Van Mission," and urged all ministers and lay preachers to unite in this work.

Mr. EDGAR WORTHINGTON and others also spoke.

Mr. Wood replied in a few words, and, having been heartily thanked by the President for the paper, the meeting dispersed.

SPEAKING recently to the members of the Eastleigh Co-operative Society, Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P., declared that under present conditions the only way to avoid the encouragement of sweating, and to be reasonably certain that one was purchasing goods made under equitable industrial conditions, was to become a loyal co-operator. For himself, he bought everything he needed at the Co-operative stores. If all connected with the stores business are not "loyal co-operators," they should be!

AMERICAN PHOTOGRAPHS.

SIR,—On behalf of a small committee, I write to beg, through you, that copies of photographs taken by visitors to Canada and the States this year may be sent as early as possible to me at Essex Hall. It is hoped to make a tolerably complete set of lantern slides for this season's lectures; and, by prompt co-operation, much needless overlapping may be saved. The slides would be available in turn to anyone applying for their use.—Yours, &c.,

COTTON MATHER.

SIR,—I think your readers may be glad to read a letter of Mather's, in my possession, which appears to follow that printed in your valuable paper in which he promises to write again "when the shippe comes back." "Master Huxett" was wrong in "feeling so hopeful."—Your obedient servant,

JOHN BARCROFT.

Boston, December ye 20th, 1682.

To MASTER JOHN HUTCHINSON.

DERE BROTHER IN CHRISTE,—In much tribulacyon do I penne ye sad newes of ye ill lucke that hath befallen Master Malachi Huxett, whom ye General Courte did order, as I wrote, to waylaye ye "Welcome" with W. Pen aboarde. Trulie ye dealings of Providence towarde his Elect people bee hid in thicke darknesse and ye shadowe of a cloude. To bee briefe, Master Huxett tooke ye "Welcome" with ye said W. Pen: sending ye shippe with sondrie of his own men for sale at Boston, while hee in ye "Propasse" did make saile for Barbadoes for to sell ye Quakers thereat. But alacke! ye "Welcome" with all aboarde was lost in a verie great tempest, and during ye saide tempest ye Quakers imprisoned on ye "Propasse" did most wyckedlie arise and overcome good Master Huxett and his men, and clapped them under ye hatches till ye shippe came to ye Barbadoes, where W. Pen did sell them for ye plantations: where, as I heare, Master Huxett is quicklie deade of a fever. He was a goode man and a faithfulle, a verie tower in Zion. I heare that ye "Propasse" with W. Pen aboarde is safelie come to harbour, with good store of rumme and sugar in ye holde. I doubt not it is for our sinnes, and all in this toun shall spend ye season of ye Newe Yeare in much humiliation of hearte insted of gladness. So you may perceive, goode Master Hutchinson, that I have no power to sende you ye rumme and parcel of tobacco ye did desyre: but I doe sende you a book of verie godlie and frutefull sermons newlie come from ye presse, and writt by my owne hande. The Lorde grant them as a consolacyon to your hearte in ye marvellous calamities Hee hath sent to rebuke ye sinnes of His poor people in Newe England, and may Hee graunt to them delights spirituall, when carnall things are minishead for a season at His goode pleasure.

Thine in griefe and humiliation,

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bedfield.—The fifteenth anniversary of the Bedfield and Monk Soham Chapel was held last Sunday, the preacher being Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, B.A., of Park-lane, Wigan. A good congregation attended from the villages to hear Mr. Higham discourse on "Books: The Telescope of the Imagination," in which was given some sound advice and real Christian teaching about the higher life of mind and soul. Miss Bredall, from Croydon, contributed solos during the afternoon and evening, and special hymns were sung. The annual tea meeting was held on the following evening, the pastor, Rev. R. Newell presiding. Miss Tagart and Miss Hill, from the Central Postal Mission, were present, and addressed the audience, conveying greetings and congratulations from the committee. Miss Tagart also declared the new men's club-room open as a reading-room, place of meeting for social purposes and entertainment, and satisfaction was expressed that the room could be thus opened and furnished free of debt. The other speakers were the Revs. J. B. Higham and William Birks, of Diss, and Messrs. Horace Taverner (Ipswich) and C. P. Dowsing (Framlingham). Miss Bredall sang and recited, also Misses A. and F. Newell, Jay, Shulver, Smith, and Mrs. B. Curtis, Mr. William Smith (organist), and Messrs. J. Warne and H. Girling contributed items of music. A lecture, with lantern views, on the "Life of Miners and Navvies," was given on the Tuesday evening as the first lecture of the season for the men's club, by the Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, at which there was a good attendance, and great interest manifested throughout the lecture.

Belfast, York-st.—On October 20 harvest services were held, the pulpit being occupied by the Rev. J. Rosenzweig, Rabbi of the Belfast Hebrew congregation. There were large attendances, and the sermons were followed with deep interest, the preacher emphasising the Jewish conception of the unity of God as the solid foundation for an uplifting religion.

Chatham (Resignation).—The minister of Hamond Hill Church, the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, having accepted the post of President of the Ananda College, Colombo, has resigned his pastoral charge, and therefore the pulpit will be vacant in January. Mr. Davis intends to initiate liberal religious services in the Sinhalese capital, and will be pleased to receive addresses of Europeans and natives likely to be sympathetic. Last Sunday evening the congregation bade farewell to our late secretary, who is emigrating to Canada, and on their behalf Mrs. Crawshaw presented to Mr. and Mrs. Sullivan a purse of gold, as a token of esteem and good wishes for their future prosperity and happiness.

Colne (Appointment).—At a meeting of the congregation held this week, it was unanimously resolved to invite Mr. H. Warnock, a late student of the Home Missionary College, to fill the pulpit vacant by the removal of the Rev. J. Evans to Rochdale.

Dob Lane, Failsforth.—The harvest festival, celebrated on Sunday and Monday last, was the most successful for many years, notwithstanding that it is the third special service within seven weeks. The pastor, the Rev. Albert Thornhill, M.A., preached to appreciative congregations, that in the evening being uncomfortably crowded. Record collections were taken, A united choir of old and present members has rendered great service in recent weeks, and on Sunday last its contributions were appropriate and reverently given. The school anniversary services, held a fortnight ago, were also very successful, the Rev. Wm. C. Hall, M.A., being the preacher. All the church organisations are in full activity, and last week a public meeting on underpaid labour was successfully organised by the chapel committee, acting in conjunction with the Social Questions Committee of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches.

Framlingham.—The 247th anniversary of the Old Meeting House took place last Sunday. The arrangement was made for the Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, B.A., to drive over from Bedfield for the evening service here, whilst

Mr. Newell took his place at Bedfield. The subject at Framlingham was "Sword and Trowel," and the lecture on the "Life of Miners and Navvies" was also given here on Wednesday evening. A good congregation was present on both occasions.

Halifax: Northgate-end Sunday-school.—The 49th annual tea-party of the Band of Hope was held on Saturday, October 26, and there was a good attendance. Following the tea, came the meeting, with Mr. G. C. Parkin in the chair, the secretary's report, showing an increase in membership, was read, the prizes were distributed, and music and a children's entertainment closed the proceedings.

Halstead: Jubilee Service.—On Sunday last Mr. Fred. Maddison, M.P., was the preacher at both afternoon and evening services. The attendance in the afternoon was augmented by friends from Braintree. At both services special soloists from Sudbury kindly assisted, Mrs. Arnold by singing "Light in Darkness" and "Angels ever Bright and Fair," and Mr. French "Calvary" and "Eternal Rest." The noted church band played "By the Fountain," "Flight of Ages," "Zauberflöte," &c. It was pleasing to see several who through advanced years are seldom able to attend, and others who received their early liberal training here, but had left Halstead, returned specially to be present at the 50th anniversary. There was a large congregation at both services.

Hinckley.—The congregation and friends here have been greatly delighted by a visit from the Rev. N. Jozan, who stayed with them, on his way home from America, on Sunday last. In the kindest and most generous manner Mr. Jozan occupied the pulpit both morning and evening. His eloquent sermons—helpful and inspiring—gave inexpressible pleasure to the many listeners, as did also his fine readings from the Bible. This kindly action on the part of Mr. Jozan was greatly appreciated by his friends in Hinckley, and will remain a pleasant remembrance in years to come.

London: Acton.—In spite of the rain which fell persistently last Tuesday evening, a fair number of people assembled in the Acton Unitarian Church, in Cressfield-road, to hear Mr. H. B. Lawford's lecture on "Venice and Verona," and to see his illustrative lantern slides, most of them from photographs taken by himself. The Rev. Arthur Hurn presided. The lecture and pictures were alike enjoyable, and at the close the audience was able to appreciate a reading by Mr. Lawford of one of Ruskin's enthusiastic passages from "The Stones of Venice." Mr. A. Barnes moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Lawford and to the lanternist, Mr. S. Prior.

London: Brixton.—The Rev. G. C. Cressey, D.D. (formerly of Salem, Mass., U.S.A.), who has conducted the services since the beginning of October, has accepted an invitation to become the minister of this church. Dr. Cressey will commence his regular ministry on the morning of Sunday, November 3, when his subject will be his "Interpretation of Liberal Christianity" and the respective "Duties of Minister and Congregation."

London: Stoke Newington Green.—The anniversary services of the Sunday-school were celebrated on Sunday last, and the interest was displayed in largely augmented congregations, both morning and evening. The morning service was conducted and the sermon preached by the Rev. Gordon Cooper, Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, and in the evening by the minister of Newington Green, Dr. Foat, M.A., who, responding to the appeal of the "Citizen Sunday Committee," had consented to preach on "The Cry of the Children," with a glimpse at its relation to Sunday-school work. In an eloquent and moving discourse, of some 40 minutes' duration, Dr. Foat said that, if the indictment of the committee "the daily sacrifice of the bodies and souls of little children," was in any large sense a true indictment, it behoved the Christian Church to remove from its borders at least "the dark stain" of so awful an impeachment, and this could never be done till the church felt, in all its relations, as an intolerable personal wrong, this needless sacrifice and slaughter of the innocents.

Manchester (Upper Brook-street).—A largely attended meeting was held on Saturday last to welcome the Rev. C. Peach on his return from the Boston Conference. The chair was taken by Councillor Marsden, J.P., and addresses were delivered by Mr. Hans Renold and Mr. W. N. Green, to which Mr. Peach responded. The special services on the following day were combined with the harvest festival, and they were all well attended.

Moneyrea.—On Tuesday week foundation stones were laid of the "Richard Lyttle Memorial National School." It will be remembered that a striking demonstration was given at the funeral of the Rev. Richard Lyttle, two years ago, of the deep impression made by his work and character upon all sections of the community. A fund of £950 has been raised through the generosity of friends belonging to different creeds, and, although somewhat more will be required to complete the scheme, the work of erecting the building of a school in his memory is now proceeding. The day chosen for the ceremony was the second anniversary of Mr. Lyttle's death. There was a large and representative attendance. Mr. A. K. Stewart presided; Mrs. Keightley, of Lisburn, and Mr. A. Spence, of Newtownbreda, laid the stones; and addresses were given by Mr. W. Gibson, J.P., Revs. G. J. Slipper, R. M. King, W. H. Drummond, J. B. Thomson, the Right Hon. Thos. Andrews, Mr. A. Spence, and Mr. Keightley. The building will provide a large school-room with supplementary class-rooms and appointments.

Mossley.—Just now the congregation are making every endeavour to raise funds for the annual sale of work. Last Saturday Mr. Charles Darnay, of Glossop, gave his recital, Dickens' "Nicholas Nickleby." For nearly two hours he kept the attention of his audience. At the close a hearty vote of thanks was accorded.

Oldbury.—A sale of work took place on Monday and Tuesday week to raise funds to liquidate a debt of about £70 on the new organ fund, &c. Mr. W. Morgan presided at the opening ceremony, when Miss Helen Caddick opened the sale; on the second day Mr. Alfred Burgess presided, and Mrs. W. G. Topping, the minister's wife, officiated. The sale proved successful, and thanks are tendered to all helpers.

Oldham-road, Manchester.—A dull day with fog haunting many places did not succeed in damping the enthusiasm nor apparently reducing the numbers of a successful gathering of past and present members and of friends on Saturday, Oct. 26, to celebrate the jubilee of the Oldham-road Unitarian Free Church and School, Manchester. Small was the beginning of the school in 1857, an offshoot from the Domestic Mission, Rochdale-road. Three years later, services on Sunday evenings were begun, and in 1863 the building in Varley-street, in which the jubilee meeting was held, was erected. There was an animated scene in the schoolroom, and much renewing of old-time friendships. Tea was served at 5 o'clock, and at 6.30 the more serious business of the evening began. Mr. Sydney Higham (choirmaster since 1881) was in the chair, and performed his duties admirably, introducing each speaker and singer with a brief statement of their services and connection with the cause at Miles Platting. Between the speeches, songs were sung by various past and present members of the choir. Mr. J. R. Hill (organist since 1888) was the accompanist. On the platform with the chairman were the Revs. Principal Gordon, M.A., W. G. Cadman, S. Thompson, and W. Griffiths, Ph.D., B.D. (minister of the church); Col. Jesse Pilcher, and Messrs. W. Robinson, H. Eardley, and J. E. Horsfield. The hymn "Life of ages richly poured" was sung, and various letters of apology for absence were read. The chairman gave a cordial and heart-felt welcome to the assembled members and friends, and hoped that when the centenary was celebrated, continued progress would be still apparent. He recalled the founders and their struggles to our grateful remembrance. The Rev. W. G. Cadman (minister of the church, 1872 to 1893) met with a hearty reception. He referred to the past history of the congregation, and pointed out that by the former presence of the Domestic Mission in that district there was Unitarianism in Miles Platting so far back as 1832. He paid high tribute to the workers he had around him during his ministry, and appealed for hearty support for the new minister, Dr. Griffiths, congratulating the church on such an appointment. Colonel Jesse Pilcher, in his speech, said he was afraid that the habit of worship was not so general as formerly. The prime and essential work of a Christian church was to inculcate that habit, and other good would follow. Principal Gordon, M.A., hoped that the jubilee would not be a mark of stagnation, but one of growth; not, however, an increase of mere pew-sitters, with no faith in themselves or the cause. We must not be afraid of teaching our faith. The Unitarian religion would never do anybody any spiritual harm, though its profession might sometimes result in material difficulty, but we need an increase of the martyr spirit. Mr. George Rayner Wood, J.P., in the unavoidable absence of the Rev. Chas. Peach, conveyed the congratulations of the Manchester and District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches. Mr. Wm. Robinson, the only surviving founder present, also spoke. Dr. Griffiths made an eloquent appeal for personal help and service, and pointed out that nothing taught in our schools would require unlearning with painful effort in after years. He made a feeling reference to the late Rev. Arthur Harvie, minister of the church from 1894-1897. On the proposition of Mr. J. R. Hill (organist since 1888), seconded by Mr. J. R. Lancashire, J.P., a hearty vote of thanks and appreciation of arduous services was passed to the Jubilee Committee, and especially to the secretaries (Messrs. J. C. Horsfield and E. Jones), to which Mr. Horsfield replied. A feature of special interest, which brought the meeting into contact with the larger life of the city, was the short visit of the Lord Mayor of Manchester (Councillor J. Harrop), who addressed the meeting, and met with a cordial reception. He congratulated the congregation on the celebration and the progress recorded, and said that when in office the Lord Mayor was of no sect, but wherever the work of the Master was being carried on there his sympathies should be. What would Manchester or any other place be, if for only twelve months the churches and chapels were closed? He liked to think of places of worship as lighthouses guiding to safety. A hearty vote of thanks, moved by Dr. Griffiths, seconded by Mr. Elliot Lord, and supported by Councillor Kemp, was passed to his Lordship for his presence and encouraging speech. The meeting was in every way a success, and should result in increased interest and renewed inspiration. The celebration was continued on the Sunday (October 27), when the Rev. W. E. Atack, preached in the morning and Dr. Griffiths in the evening.

South Shields.—On Wednesday, Oct. 23, a conversazione was held to welcome the Rev. W. Lindsay, our newly appointed minister. Sir J. Baxter Ellis, of Newcastle, occupied the chair, and reminded Mr. Lindsay that the ablest preachers had not always the most successful churches, but rather the man who visited and sympathised and took a keen and active interest in the welfare of his congregation would have the strongest and most successful church. He hoped God would prosper him in his labours, and that his sojourn in South Shields would be filled with blessing and prosperity. A welcome on behalf of the Northumberland and Durham U.C. Association, was given by the President, Rev. W. H. Lambelle, in a most inspiring address. A welcome on behalf of the church was given by Mr. A. Robinson, and on behalf of Sunday-school, by Mr. T. F. Bolam. Words of welcome were also spoken by Mr. F. Robson, secretary, and others. Rev. W. Lindsay suitably responded.

JESUS OF NAZARETH

An Historical and Critical Survey of His Life and Teaching.

By ETIENNE GIRAN,

Pastor of the Old Walloon Church, Amsterdam.

Translated by E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.

Unity says: "A remarkable and intensely interesting book. In a marvellously clear and graphic manner the author, through his translator, lays bare the results of the work of New Testament critical scholarship, takes his readers through simple analytical processes, enabling them to dissect the gospel records for themselves and to judge what is unhistorical and what is true. With this little volume in his hand, the intelligent reader who has also the ability to write is able to compile from the New Testament an approximately accurate account of the life and teaching of Jesus."

MR. R. B. HALDANE AND "PUBLIC OPINION."

The Right Hon. R. B. Haldane, M.P.,
Secretary for War, has addressed the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION:—

WAR OFFICE, 1st October, 1907.

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion" under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed on men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists, the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. HALDANE.

India Paper edition published last year

BOUND IN CLOTH, 7s. 6d. net. IN LEATHER, from 10s. net

THE INTERLINEAR BIBLE is so printed that both Authorised and Revised Versions may be read with ease from one text. It displays at a glance the position, extent and nature of the differences between the Versions. The simple plan adopted is shown in the accompanying passage, which, read along the upper line throughout, gives the Revised Version, and, along the lower, the Authorised. "Since the publication of the Revised Version," says the Westminster Gazette, "several attempts have been made to produce Bibles in which the different readings of the two Versions would be clearly seen. By far the most successful effort in this direction is The Interlinear Bible."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Martineau Memorial Buildings at the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, are to be opened by Sir John Brunner on Thursday next. The opening service in the old chapel is at half-past two, so that friends who go down from London by the ten o'clock train from Liverpool-street, due at Norwich 1.15, will be in plenty of time; and for those who are obliged to return the same day there is a good train back at 6.22, due at Liverpool-street, 9.25. On the following Sunday morning Dr. Carpenter is to preach at the Octagon. In our leader column a statement as to the financial position will be found.

THE attention of the members of churches in the Province of London and the South-Eastern Counties is directed to the series of meetings to be addressed by the Rev. Joseph Wood, president of the National Conference, as advertised in another column. The first meeting is at Richmond, on Tuesday, and the last at Dr. Williams's Library, on Wednesday evening, November 20. The members of the churches within reach of each of these meetings will avail themselves, we trust, of this opportunity for stimulus and mutual encouragement.

THE bicentenary of the congregation of Hope-street Church, Liverpool—that is to say, the 200th anniversary of the granting of a licence to the New Meeting House in Kay-street, in 1707, of which the Paradise-street Chapel was the successor, and after it the present Hope-street Church—is to be celebrated on Sunday, November 24, by special services, and by a social meeting on the following evening, at which an address is to be given by the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed.

MANY of our brethren in America manifested a keen interest in the experiences of the Van Mission, and were eager to obtain information from those who had taken practical part in the work. Thus the Revs. T. P. Spedding and Charles Peach, on their arrival in Boston, were at once beset by questioners, and had many more invitations to speak in public on the subject than they could possibly accept. They did, however, find several opportunities, and we may be sure they made good use of them. Thus, after the International week, they attended the Connecticut Valley Conference at Greenfield, at which Miss von Petzold was the preacher, and on the following day, the Worcester Conference at Winchendon, at which the Rev. Alexander Webster preached. Mr. Spedding spoke more particularly of the Van Mission, and Mr. Peach of other Unitarian matters, especially in the Manchester district. They had previously addressed a meeting in Dr. Hale's church in Boston, who himself expressed great interest in the Mission, and finally they addressed the Ministers' Fraternal in New York. Mr. Spedding fully anticipates that a similar mission will be undertaken in the Eastern States next year. In the November number of the New York Unitarian we are promised an article on Van Missions by the Editor.

THE country heard with great relief and thankfulness on Thursday morning that the threatened disaster of a great railway strike had been averted, and that through the intervention of the President of the Board of Trade the Railway Companies and the men's Societies had agreed to a comprehensive scheme of conciliation and arbitration. The agreement is definitely for six years, with good hope for a permanent settlement of the relations between employers and employed on a sound basis of peace. Mr. Lloyd-George has done a great thing in this successful work of mediation.

A LONG-STANDING disagreement between two Baptist bodies in Hungary has led to the appointment, by the Baptist World Alliance, of a committee of arbitration. With the hope of bringing about a better understanding between the parties, and of combining them in one strong union, the committee will proceed to Budapesth at the end of this month. The members are Dr. Clifford, Dr. Newton H. Marshall, Rev. Claus Peters, of Hamburg, and Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, Secretary of the Baptist Union. The Baptist cause is reported to have made remarkable headway in Hungary during the last decade.

HIS brother ministers having severely taken him to task for saying that the Pharisees were the Nonconformists of their day, Mr. Campbell, of the City Temple, has found a defender in the Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, of Bradford, who recently referred to Mr. Campbell's teaching and treatment in terms wanting neither in vigour nor logic. He maintained that the statement was historically accurate, but that Mr. Campbell's teaching by no means implied that all Nonconformists were hypocrites. His point was that they had the defects of their qualities. A great fault of modern Nonconformity, Mr. Williams maintained, was spiritual pride, unconscious in them as in the Pharisees of old. They were setting up an exclusive standard and judging all men by it. "I will show you," said Mr. Williams, "some of the things that put a good deal of truth into the indictment. When Free Church Councils were formed, they decided to exclude Unitarians. Was not that thanking God that they were not as other men were, and not as the Unitarians? The very theory of Church membership in Nonconformist bodies is precisely a Pharisaic theory, that the Church consists of people who are not as other men are—converted people, saints."

MR. WILLIAMS then went on to say that owing to the publication of his alleged heretical book, Mr. Campbell had been dismissed from the executive of the Free Church Council, and further "Official Nonconformity would put Mr. Campbell out of the City Temple to-morrow if only it could. Official religion boycotts him as the Pharisees did Jesus, and if these officials were living in the Pharisees' time and had their power, they would do with him what the Pharisees did with Jesus. If Nonconformists resent being told these things, the remedy is quite simple—let them cease to do these things. Of course there are thousands of Nonconformists who don't share that spirit at all; but Mr. Campbell was indicting official Nonconformity, and the indictment was true to the syllable."

AT the instance of the Manchester District Social Questions Committee a successful public meeting on "Sweated Industries" was organised by the Failsworth congregation, and held in the Co-operative Hall on October 25. A powerful address was given by Miss Clementina Black, after a resolution had been moved by the Rev. A. Thornhill and seconded by Mr. Upham, president of the Co-operative Society, calling the Government's attention to the urgency of the question; other speakers followed and the resolution was carried.

A VERY pleasant ceremony took place in Manchester Town Hall on Monday, when a portrait of the veteran town clerk, Sir W. H. Talbot, was presented to the city, to be hung in the Town Hall, and a replica of the portrait to Lady Talbot. Sir James Hoy, in unveiling the portrait, and the Lord Mayor, in accepting the gift, spoke in the highest terms of Sir William's services to the city and of his high character. The honour recently conferred upon him by the King had been warmly appreciated in the city.

THE newspapers have recorded the death of Mr. Algernon Sydney Field, of Leamington, as that of "the oldest solicitor in England." To many of our readers the event is of more significance. The late Mr. Field, who was born in 1813, was the seventh of the thirteen children of the Rev. William Field, and through him a grandson of Ann Cromwell, great-great-granddaughter of Oliver Cromwell. The Rev. William Field was in 1789 ordained by Dr. Priestley and the Rev. Thomas Belsham to the pastorate of Warwick, which he retained till 1843, eight years before his death. His eldest son, Mr. Edwin Wilkins Field, is famous in our history in connection with the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, which became law chiefly through his skilful and arduous labours. A memorial notice of Mr. Field will be found in another column.

THE Rev. Sydney H. Street, whose serious breakdown in health necessitated his resignation of the charge of Bell-street Domestic Mission, London, is making a steady recovery. He and his family are staying at Engelberg, in Switzerland, for the winter; and he has good hopes that when he returns to England in the spring he will be fully restored to health, and able to take another charge.

THE Royal Institute of British Architects is preparing a plan of the suburbs of London showing the manner in which, in their judgment, the whole area should be laid out on a comprehensive system for the general good. When ready, they propose to distribute copies, especially among the governing bodies of London, to stimulate interest in the effort to make greater London healthy and beautiful.

WE regret that a letter purporting to be from the pen of Cotton Mather, with reference to William Penn, should have appeared in these columns. It is described by Mr. Gilbert Cope, a Pennsylvanian Friend, as a hoax which was first exposed some 40 years ago. We were misled by its insertion in a usually well-informed contemporary, with some particulars of its so-called discovery.

BISHOP BAYNES ON THE DRINK EVIL AT THE HIGH PAVEMENT CHAPEL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

WE take the following extracts from the Nottingham Guardian of October 18 :—

Last night Bishop Hamilton Baynes addressed the first of this winter's periodical meetings of the Nottingham High Pavement Temperance Society, when Mr. F. Robinson presided over a fairly good attendance of members.

The Bishop remarked that he knew that he was looked upon with a certain amount of suspicion by some of his temperance friends; but he held certain views on the subject of temperance which he hoped might not be out of accord with those of his hearers when they met on the common basis of their union, a common spirit and a common work. He was not content either in that or other matters with mere negations, with the attitude which led people to turn their backs upon everything that might contaminate them, or might be an inducement to evil, because it simply created a form of religious priggishness. Beside, the logical outcome of the ascetic principle that evil was to be met by giving it up, or avoiding it, was that of the Buddhist, who held that he must not only mortify the body, but give up the soul and life, which was the reductio ad absurdum of the whole system. The Christian idea was not the ascetic or the negative view. It was that they should go out into the world and take into it something much more powerful and omnipotent than evil; something which would overcome the evil, something which would give people a stronger, fuller, larger, happier life. The true spirit of their religion was that they conquered evil things by good things, the bad life by the holy life, lust by true love, and the craving of their flesh by the hunger and thirst of their souls. The only really hopeful way of combating the drink evil was to make the life of their tempted brethren so interesting, so absorbing by other and higher pursuits that they had no longer any time or leisure for the temptations of drink and the lower forms of evil. Personally he welcomed everything that made for that larger life, and for that reason he welcomed the Labour Party, which would make men feel that they had a real share in the most noble and dignified work of organising society. He also welcomed all the other things, such as institutes, clubs, games, recreations, which helped towards that which was the fullest life—the life of love. Passing on to consider the legislative side of the question, Bishop Baynes looked forward to the passing of a new Act which, if it would not enable them to make people sober, would, at all events, make it more difficult for people to get drunk. He recognised that they had a strong body to oppose in those who set it forth that their trade was their politics, which, to his mind, constituted it a dangerous trade in the sense that its own private interests were put before those of the whole community. The question of compensation and a time limit blocked the way, but they must continue to tell those who accused them of confiscation that there never was any freehold in the matter, and that it was merely by accident that their expectations had been created. He also anticipated the day when the trade would be subject to greater restrictions, when Sunday trading would be abolished, when earlier closing would put an end to the orgies which constantly disturbed the late hours in Nottingham, especially on Saturday nights; when there would be later opening in a morning; when there would be fewer facilities at holiday times; when public-houses would be closed on election days; and, if possible, the stoppage of the barmaid system, because he did not think it was a trade that was desirable for young girls. He also hoped that the problem of clubs, which was becoming more and more pressing, as there were so many bogus clubs that were really drinking saloons, would be met boldly. With regard to the question of total prohibition, he said he would be glad when the country thought it could do without the trade altogether, but he was of opinion that they must be sensible and face the probabilities of the situation. It was no good them running their heads against a stone wall, which was rather what the local vetoists were doing, and until the proportion of total abstainers, at present one-tenth of the community, increased, they must seek in every way to curtail the traffic and see that it was carried on in the least objectionable way. For that reason he believed in the greater spread of disinterested management, as one of the curses of the trade was the craze for making money out of it, and he would like to see the public-house partake more of the character of the continental restaurant. At the same time, he looked for more reform to come from personal effort and from the opening out of the fuller life for the people, than from legislative enactment.

In thanking Bishop Hamilton Baynes for his address, the Rev. J. Lloyd Thomas remarked that he believed in total abstinence, not from any ascetic principle, but from the test of social utility and spiritual fruitfulness, and looking broadly over human society, he believed abstinence to be the proper attitude. At the same time, he agreed that mere negation was fruitless, and that in their striving after the realisation of a larger and nobler life for the community they would have to combat the causes which led to drunkenness, as, after all, drink was, in many cases, a refuge against the misery and monotony of existence, and the wretchedness of social conditions.

WE are glad to see the announcement of a new volume of Dent's Temple Biographies, "Abraham Lincoln," by Mr. Henry Bryan Binns, whose "Life of Walt Whitman" has an established place as a work of the highest value.

THAT interesting body of Russian non-conformists in Canada, the Dukhobors, is making steady industrial progress. At Yorktown, they have established one of the largest brick-making plants in the Dominion capable of producing 50,000 bricks per diem. It need hardly be added that it is a communal enterprise, and is managed by the leaders of the Yorktown community. The little bands of somewhat fantastic pilgrims whose errands have bulked so largely in the public mind, constitute the merest fraction, hardly more than 1 per cent., of a large body of sensible and industrious people.

AFTER THE INTERNATIONAL. HOME AGAIN.

It is difficult, when one is home again, getting one's neck back into the editorial collar, amid mountains of accumulated work, to keep hold of the final memories of a delightful journey with sufficient clearness and quietness of mind, to be able to write anything about them; and yet one is unwilling to let them slip away altogether.

First, however, a word of very cordial thanks to the friends who have taken such good care of the INQUIRER during these past weeks.

And now, is it possible to get back to that Saturday morning (October 19), when we came away from the New Hampshire woods and the vision of snow upon the distant hills? There had been a keen frost that night, and it was just a morning to stay in the glorious sunshine and roam over the hills; but if we had to go it was good to have it so beautiful, and to watch, as our train travelled southward, how the great height of Mount Washington appeared over the distant hills to the north, and how our own Chocorua looked up again and again, when we thought we had had the last glimpse, through fresh vistas of the woodland bordering the hills, as though loath to say good-bye. But the parson had set his face to Cambridge and his mind to the sermon that was to be next day. So it was the early morning train we took, and the traveller was bent upon a Whittier pilgrimage.

There are two roads by which one can return from Madison and the Ossipees to Boston—either by Portsmouth and Newburyport and the coast line, or by Exeter and Haverhill, somewhat further inland. Either would serve for the Whittier country, for a line of electric cars now runs from Haverhill down the valley of the Merrimac to Amesbury, and thence to Newburyport and the coast; but as it was natural to prefer to begin with the birthplace, my friends kindly took the westward road home and I dropped off at Haverhill, to make my pilgrimage, and so get back to Cambridge from Newburyport at night.

Baedeker says that Whittier's birthplace is only a mile from Haverhill, but when I set out from the streets of the busy town to make my way there on foot, I found the road stretch out further and further, and it is in fact just three miles, and then some eight miles further on to Amesbury; so for the rest of the way it was pleasant to have the half-hourly electric car for a conveyance. It is pleasant country, with broad spaces, and low wooded hills, and the Merrimac is a noble river, for which one can well understand Whittier's love.

From the house where he was born (December 17, 1807) the river is not seen, and is more than a mile away; nor was the straight high road there a hundred years ago, which now passes close by. From the corner where it crosses the old road one sees the little old house, a couple of fields away, on the hillside just across the brook, and there is still no other house in sight. The barn, which stands on the other side of the road, in the field opposite the gate, is twice the size it was when Whittier grew up there. The old house is now preserved with pious care, and held in trust as a memorial of the poet. There one can sit in the quaint old kitchen, and realise the scene immortalised in "Snow-bound," and go through other rooms of the house, and see many relics of his boyhood and later life. Some of the old books are there, sent back from Amesbury when the house was acquired from other hands into which it had passed, among them a copy of the two-volume edition of the Journal of George Fox, published in London in 1709. But even more than the house itself is the scene amid which it stands to one who loves the spirit of Whittier's verse and the man himself. It is just a simple, quiet, country scene, the homely garden, with orchard ground at the back, and the sloping meadows, with a wooded hill-side overhanging the brook, which comes down the slope, where the mill once stood, and so drops down past the house, and is crossed immediately afterwards by a little bridge on the old road. Fernside brook, by which the house is built, flows eastward into the larger Country brook, and so there is a wider view across the meadows of its valley to more distant wooded hills beyond, and within a circle of about two miles from the house there are at least three little lakes, including that which Whittier renamed Kenoza, close by Haverhill, as well as the great river. Thus there was food enough for the boy's growing love of Nature, and it was hardly more than ten miles down to the coast, crossing the Merrimac at the Rocks Bridge (or by ferry, if there was no bridge then) and so by the direct road to Newburyport, the road by which, no doubt the young Lloyd Garrison came, when he walked out to find the youth whose verses he had printed in the Newburyport Free Press.

At Amesbury I had the same feeling as at Haverhill. What I cared for most was just to be in the place, to walk quietly along the road with its pleasant trees (Friend-street), in which the house stands, which was for so many years, and to the end, Whittier's home. Further up the road is the Meeting House to which he was accustomed to go. It was built in 1851, from plans which he himself made, and took the place of an earlier Meeting House, which used to stand just opposite his own door, and which the family attended even when they lived eight miles away, at Haverhill.

It was, of course, very interesting to go into the Whittier house itself, where visitors are courteously received by Mr. Pickard, the poet's biographer, husband of the niece to whom the house was left. There one sees the rooms which Whittier habitually occupied, with his books and the pictures on the walls, just as they were, when he left them fifteen years ago; and from the study, on the ground floor, one looks out into the garden, which meant so much to him. There it was that the gathering of many friends took place for the quiet service at his funeral.

Most welcome in this centenary year is the cheaper one-volume edition of his "Life and Letters of John Greenleaf Whittier" which Mr. Pickard has just brought out, and those who like to have pictures of the poet's two homes and of people and places connected with them, together with many stories and personal touches associated with his life, will find them in the smaller book from the same loyal pen, "Whittier-Land," which was first published three years ago. This little book (it costs a dollar) has a chapter on "Whittier's Sense of Humor," which contains some good stories, and among other things of the kind, some nonsense verses on "How they Climbed Chocorua."

From Amesbury it is perhaps four miles by electric car to Newburyport, crossing the Merrimac by a double bridge at Deer Island. Before leaving Amesbury the line passes at the foot of the Union Cemetery, in the upper part of which Whittier is buried. The grave is simplicity itself, with a plain head-stone standing in a line with eight other smaller stones, marking the graves of a niece, and of all the other members of the family commemorated in "Snow-bound." The little plot of ground is surrounded by a well-kept hedge of arbor vitæ, guarded by two tall cedars.

When I reached Newburyport the evening was already closing in, and there was only time to walk through one or two streets in the little seaport town, and find the house where William Lloyd Garrison was born, a plain little house, just at the back of the Old South Church, in which George Whitefield was buried (1770). Before the train for Boston came in from the north across the long bridge which spans the mouth of the Merrimac, the moon was already gleaming on the waters of the estuary.

But there must be an end of these lingering memories. Sunday also was a day of pilgrimage, from Cambridge, by electric car, over Arlington Heights to Lexington, and then after a quiet half-hour on the green—where is the stone marking the line of the Minute men, April 19, 1775, with the memorable words of the Captain, Theodore Parker's grandfather—on by another car to Concord. I had hoped for a sunny day there, to make amends for the deluge which greeted us on the Monday of the International week; but it was not to be, and during morning service the rain came down again and persisted for the rest of the day. Yet sunshine I did find in abundance with Miss Ellen Emerson, through happy hours under the hospitable shelter of the old house.

Monday brought the last farewells in Boston, with happy pledges of old and new friendships, and then the night journey by the Fall River route to New York. At six o'clock next morning we were in the broad waters approaching the great city from the north, and the sun and moon both were up, looking one another full in the face from opposite sides of the heavens.

There remained a long day for a first glimpse of New York, and mid-day a delightful interlude of lunch with Robert Collyer, safely home from his triumphs in old Yorkshire, delighted with all that had befallen him there. The finest thing I saw in New York was, I think, Saint Gauden's statue of Admiral Farragut in Maddison-square, and after that the great Washington Arch, opening upon Fifth-avenue, with its inscription, in the President's own words, "Let us raise a standard to which the wise and the honest can repair. The event is in the hand of God." The Oceanic sailed from New York at half-past six on Wednesday morning, October 23, and was at Southampton before noon on the following Wednesday

ELEMENTS OF PSYCHOLOGY.*

THE aim of the writers who have here collaborated was to produce a text-book which should be helpful in the teaching of psychology, and which should meet the needs and difficulties of those who are beginning this branch of study. There can be no question, we think, that this book does attain this important end more completely than any other existing treatise on the subject. Professor William James's "Text-Book," and Dr. Stout's "Manual" go rather more fully into some of the abstruser departments of psychology, but they are by no means so well adapted to meet the requirements of those who are newly entering upon this difficult subject. There is one most valuable feature in the present volume which is lacking in the other works. At the end of each of its sixteen chapters full references are given to passages in the works of leading psychologists, where students will find the subject still further elaborated. Though the book modestly bears upon its title-page the word "Elements" it really omits few, if any, of the more important of the questions which are now being discussed by psychological experts. Hence not only beginners but advanced students also will be interested in a work which derives its value not only from the original ideas of its authors, but also from striking quotations from the writings of Sully, James Ward, William James, Stout, Höfding, &c., and from the most important articles in Mind and in Baldwin's "Dictionary of Psychology and Philosophy."

The chapters which appear to us most valuable and suggestive are Chapter V. on "Mind and Brain"; Chapters VI. and VII. on "Mental Activity," Chapter IX. on "The Emotions," and the very interesting final chapter on "The Self."

The authors show sound judgment in the prominence and importance which they give to the subject of "Mental Activity." In their treatment of this they agree in the main with the views of Dr. Stout, and dissent entirely from Mr. F. H. Bradley's doctrine that the active will plays no part in the all-important experience of "Attention." In the chapter on "Mind and Brain" the question is considered whether consciousness exerts any causal power over cerebral and muscular changes; a question on which Huxley and Martineau had most interesting encounters in the old days of the "Metaphysical Society." Much amusement was caused at one of the meetings of this society, at which Huxley read a paper on "Has the frog a soul?" by Lord Selborne, stating that on that morning he was walking along Oxford-street intending to go straight to the Marble Arch, when he happened to glance at his boots, and that glance suggested an idea which was followed by his deviating from his intended route and turning down Regent-street where his bootmaker lived. "Do you really mean to say, Professor Huxley," asked Lord Selborne, "that this idea about the boots had no causal connection with the change in the direction of my walk?" "Not the slightest," replied the Professor. Most of the members, however, looked incredulous, and agreed with Dr. Martineau, who took the opposite view. We are interested to see that the able authors of this treatise go entirely with Dr. Martineau here. As they lucidly express it, "On Huxley's view consciousness would come into being whenever molecular motion attained a certain degree of complexity, as it does in the cortex of the brain. But the whole physical series being absolutely determined in its course, consciousness has no power whatever to change the course of events; it becomes a mere 'epi-phenomenon,' a spark thrown out as the wheels clash on the rails. What we call the freedom of the will becomes 'a pure dogma, based on an illusion, and has no real existence.' The train of thought which results in 'In Memoriam,' the heroism of a Grace Darling, the philanthropy of a Howard, can all be expressed in terms of a mere mechanical sequence. . . . To us, on the other hand, the essence of consciousness appears to lie in the fact that it is purposive; we believe that we have the power of dwelling on some motives and excluding others, and so selecting our own course of action. Our conduct is self-determined. This belief is set down by the mechanicians as an illusion. But why such an illusion should have arisen is wholly unintelligible."

There follows a searching examination of the respective claims of the double aspect theory of the relation between body and mind, and of the antagonistic theory of the Interaction of the two. If we correctly understand our authors, they incline to the Interaction theory which is stoutly maintained by Professors Ward and James (and which is in our view undoubtedly the true one), rather than to the theory of Psycho-physical Parallelism which Dr. Stout appears to accept.

As one among many instances in this book of acute and original psychological analysis, we may mention the very important distinction which is made between two modes of choice—an intellectual choice and a volitional one:—"It is important to be clear about those two modes of choice, for the difference is a momentous one. A volitional choice means a change, or at least a distinct step, in the growth of character; an intellectual choice is a confirmation of the character already won. When Satan exclaims, 'Evil, be thou my good,' it is a volitional choice; and in thus accepting evil as his avowed end he makes a definite advance in the evolution of his character. When Coriolanus bends his proud revenge to his natural love for his mother, he makes a volitional choice which so alters his character that our sympathy goes forth to the arrogant man whose motive force had hitherto been a low ambition. When Macbeth resolves on Duncan's murder, and so slays his honour on ambition's altar, he makes a volitional choice; when he decrees that Banquo too must perish, it is because his intellect decrees that only so can he retain his crown."

The long and excellent section on the "Feeling of Effort," and on the physiological processes connected with it, will well repay careful study. It is in the feeling of effort that we have the most convincing experience of ourselves as agents. Our life often flows on without our guidance or interference, but in the case of effort we are essentially actors—we take the stream and turn it into the direction we desire. The analysis of this feeling is intimately connected with the question of the freedom of the will; for if we really possess such freedom, the exercise of it is, we think, most marked in determining the amount of effort we put forth in the act of attention. Our authors decline the discussion of the problem of free-will, and content themselves with briefly describing the three typical opinions on this subject, as held by Bain, Martineau, and Green. Probably many of their readers will wish as we do, that they had explicitly stated their own view and their reasons for it. Many passages in the volume, however, appear clearly to imply that the writers are on the libertarian side.

The chapter on "The Emotions" is particularly good; and students of Ethics will find the analysis of the moral sentiments very helpful. Sympathy and the feeling of Reverence appear to be the essential factors in the development of the ethical consciousness:—"When a community has developed the capacity of disinterested sympathy, and of appreciating the results of actions on the common welfare, a system of customary rules of conduct begins to take shape. We must add that in this regard for the common good as more worthy, or as having higher claims than momentary or individual inclinations and passions, the action of the purely ethical sentiment of Reverence is to be found." Here we recognise the influence of Dr. Martineau's ethical theory.

The concluding chapter on "The Self," deals somewhat elaborately with some very difficult problems; and gives interesting accounts of those psychological puzzles called "alternations of personality." The authors regard the soul as of "infinite complexity," and say that with the abandonment of the old idea of the soul as a simple substance "many of the traditional difficulties of philosophy vanish." "Personal identity" with them means a continuity of what they term successive selves; "each self passing imperceptibly into the next; the change being so gradual that it is rarely detected at the time."

We feel a difficulty in understanding how each "self" as it vanishes manages to hand over its properties and its responsibilities to its successor. We should prefer to speak, not of successive selves, but of successive phenomenal states of one and the same metaphysical self.

Professor James maintains that for the psychologist the supposition that there exist individual selves having continuous existence through time is altogether unnecessary. The present writers call this in question, and we think, successfully. They contend that if consciousness coincided in extent with the self, and if there were no time-gaps as in sleep, and other periods of unconsciousness, James's theory might present a certain plausibility. As things are, each time we 'rack our brains' for a piece of information which is not now in consciousness, but which we know we can bring there, we demonstrate its inadequacy."

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST.*

THE University of Leiden has done honour to the scholarship and impartiality of the Oxford School of Theology by the election of the most eminent of its younger representatives to the Chair of New Testament and Early Christian Literature. Professor Lake was a few years ago curate of St. Mary the Virgin, and afterwards, with the aid of the Hibbert and other similar trusts, travelled among the monasteries of Mount Athos in search of early Greek manuscripts and published the results of his work in more than one learned volume. Now he appears, we believe, for the first time as a writer on a subject which concerns all, and in a style which all thoughtful readers will understand.

Such a book as this was, indeed, much needed, for though the subject is necessarily treated of one way or another in every Life of Christ, there is, so far as we know, no English book in which it is discussed by itself as an insulated narrative or fact, and without prejudice one way or the other. Without prejudice, but not without the greatest concern, for if any man approaches the question indifferent as to what the answer will be, he proves himself already prejudiced against the truth of the story. "He was crucified, dead and buried, the third day he rose again from the dead," says the most ancient creed of Christendom, and thousands of millions have lived and died in assured conviction that it was even so. Until our own day the doubters have been individuals who scarce count at all against the multitude of devout believers of every church from the Roman to the Unitarian. But now they are increased who trouble the ancient security of belief; and while Unitarians have, for the most part, given up the position they maintained of old with so much confidence and determination, the more orthodox churches have become conscious of the peril in which they stand while they ground their faith on this article and have to deplore the falling away of many of their own adherents.

Was Jesus really dead, and did he come to life again thirty-six hours after he died? Such is the question, and perhaps no more important one in respect of matters of human history could be framed. If he did, then he stands apart from all other men who have ever lived or died—apart even from such, if ever such there were, as have been raised again after dying, for their resurrection is told of as having taken place through another, an Elijah or a Christ, and they rose only to continue a mortal life. This man rose at no human call, and rose to die no more. If it really were so, it is easy to believe, it is almost rational to be credulous, about all else told of him. In the light of the Resurrection the Virgin birth seems natural, the greatest of the Gospel miracles things to be expected. If, on the other hand, it did not so happen, if it be true, as the poet sang, while with burning heart he walks the sinful streets of Christian Naples that Easter Sunday sixty years ago:—

"Christ is not risen, no—
He lies and moulders low;

* "The Historical Evidence for the Resurrection of Jesus Christ." By Kirsopp Lake, M.A. (Oxon). Crown Theological Library, vol. xxi. (Williams and Norgate. 6s.)

Christ is not risen!
What though the stone were rolled away, and though
The grave found empty there?—
If not there then elsewhere;
If not where Joseph laid him first, why then
Where other men
Translaid him after, in some humbler clay."
If so, then, Jesus was man even like us, son of human father and mother, a brother, a teacher, by no means our God.

But how is the true answer to be found? There is no other way except the one adopted by our author of "historical research." Spiritual experience may suffice to convince the person, whoever is the subject of it, that Jesus is now in communion with him and therefore now living and not dead; it cannot legitimately be pressed to cover the Gospel narratives. No fact of history can be attested except by historical evidence. In this respect the assertions that Jesus "was crucified under Pontius Pilate" and that "he rose from the dead, ascended into heaven" are on the same level. Possible witnesses of the facts are no more, there is left us only the documents more or less originating out of their convictions and reports.

It is this Documentary Evidence which the writer of the small book before us examines with dispassionate carefulness. The whole of it might be put in a very few pages. There is, first and earliest, the account given by St. Paul how Jesus, after his death, "appeared" to the apostles and to five hundred brethren at once, and last of all to himself. Of the subjective reality of this appearance to himself he was, of course, the only and entirely reliable witness, but the mention of it suggests that the other appearances he reports were of the same kind, and, as such, however real, no evidence for the quickening of a dead body. Next in order of time is the narrative which ends so abruptly with the eighth verse of the last chapter of Mark, a narrative which may tentatively be reconstructed out of the probably parallel passages in Matthew and Luke. Then come the stories as told in these two later Gospels and implied in the Acts, the very ancient conclusion of Mark which we read in our Bibles, the narrative of the Fourth Gospel and those of the Apocryphal Gospels of Peter and the Hebrews.

It is a comparatively easy task to examine and compare these various statements. It is in his seventh and last chapter that our author attacks the great—perhaps we should say the insoluble—problem. What are the facts which lie behind this variously rendered tradition? The story of the women about their finding of the tomb open and empty cannot be admitted as one of these facts, for it is probable that they did not attach serious importance to it until after the appearances in Galilee had given rise to the belief in the Resurrection. Nor is the insistence on the third day of much account, "for from the beginning it was regarded as the day of the resurrection on theological rather than on historical grounds." These two particulars in which all the narratives agree being thus put aside there remains only "the convincing evidence that the disciples believed that the Lord had appeared to Peter and to others," and so our research seems to lead us at last only into a land of dim shadows. Of what kind were these "appearances"—delusions of vision? true spirit forms? or due, as came later to be believed, to the actual presence of "a resuscitated corpse"?

Space does not allow of our following Professor Lake through his able discussion of these alternatives. Frequent and anxious meditation of the subject long ago compelled the present writer to the conclusion which he was reluctant to admit "that the appearances were independent of the belief or feelings of the disciples. In other words, the disciples saw what they saw because there really was a spiritual being which had an existence independent of them and produced the appearances. This view explains all the facts and agrees with the undoubted belief of the disciples." But what is a spiritual being?

JESUS OF NAZARETH.*

THERE are plenty of people who want a book of this sort. Its writer is interested in the man Jesus and his message; not in any theological transformations of them. He tells his story briefly and clearly, as a critical but reverent historian. After a short sketch of the political and social condition of Palestine at the birth of Jesus, he gives us an account of the documents of the case, indicating the origins of our Gospels, their underlying sources and their relative authority. This account is particularly well done, and the eager students who want the whole results of Gospel-criticism explained in ten minutes will find it useful. Then follows the actual survey: twenty odd pages on the childhood, ending in a rejection of the Virgin birth and the Bethlehem origin of Jesus; fifteen pages on the "Period before the Ministry," twenty-seven on "Jesus in Galilee," nineteen on "The Messiah," and twenty-seven on "The Last Days." Follows in twelve pages an examination of the accounts of the Resurrection, with four pages of suggestions towards understanding the central teaching of Jesus.

The special excellence of the book is its compression in small space of matter which mostly has to be drawn together from different sources. History, religious ideas, social customs, geographical information are all neatly combined with an account of the journeyings and teachings of Jesus; and the result is a narrative which, in spite of the brevity of a survey, is instructive and vivid. Sunday-school teachers will find it helpful for elder-class work; especially if they read it themselves beforehand.

Of course, any life of Jesus at present must be regarded as experimental and provisional. Some of the things we are most anxious to know we shall probably never know with any certainty. But since the weight of tradition has broken we are all the while getting nearer to the probabilities; and M. Giran is a reliable guide to an estimate of Jesus which has been formed by some trustworthy scholars. He expresses his acknowledgments to such writers as A. Réville, J. E. Carpenter, Loisy, Stapfer and Harnack. Yet even this list has limitations, which are reflected in M. Giran's volume. He betrays no consciousness of the great significance of the researches into the mother-language of Jesus. The historical critics, after all, are more bound by tradition than they sometimes realise. The old habit of taking the document as final survives in much newer criticism; and, as the journalists say, some of them think all is over except the shouting if they get back to the earliest possible Greek source of our present Gospels. But that earliest Greek source is still a long way from the Aramaic thoughts of Jesus.

* "Jesus of Nazareth: An Historical and Critical Survey of his Life and Teaching." By Etienne Giran. Translated by E. L. H. Thomas. (London: Sunday School Association, 1907. 2s. net.)

Nothing has brought this more plainly to view than the discussions on the Messiahship of Jesus. The relation of Jesus to the Messianic idea is a cardinal point in any attempt to write his life; and the question what Jesus meant when he used the expression "Son of Man" is one of the most important to answer before one begins. M. Giran is evidently content with the view he takes from his authorities about the Messiahship—a view which depends chiefly on the Gospel of Mark. So he represents Jesus as visited in his youth by dreams of the regeneration of his people; attracted by the mission of John the Baptist, he is baptized by him, but a feeling that gentler means than those of John are needed sends him into the wilderness to meditate. The clue to the Temptation legend is found in the conflict in the soul of Jesus as to the Messianic mission and methods; the whole of the subsequent ministry is agitated by the urgency of this same idea; its appropriation at length to his own personality is the occasion of the catastrophe which ends in his crucifixion. The view is psychologically possible, and there is much in the literary evidence of Mark's Gospel to support it. But, on the other hand, the differences between Mark and the other Gospels on this question are profound. From Mark's account we can explain the evolution of the Messianic claims advanced, as from the very birth, in Matthew and Luke, and from the Baptism, in John. But if we can disabuse our minds of their prepossession about the finality of the document, we are prepared for the question whether Mark's authority is on this point any better than the other Gospels. It is true that the identification of Jesus with a spiritualised doctrine of Messiah lies at the heart of the preaching of Paul and the apostles; but this does not prove that Jesus himself had anything to do with the Messianic idea. In that dark interval between the Aramaic preaching of Jesus and the appearance of our earliest Greek record lies the answer to this and to many another problem of the life of Jesus. Whether Jesus did appropriate the idea at all, or whether the representing of Jesus as Messiah was, in Dr. Martineau's phrase, the "first act of Christian mythology," is an open question. Schmidt's tenth chapter of his Prophet of Nazareth is an example how the life of Jesus may be written without reference to an idea which we are accustomed to regard as one of the indisputable starting points. The next point for consideration in the discussion is whether after all the expectation of a national deliverer was so widespread and influential in general, and particularly in Palestine in the time of Jesus, as we have taken for granted. The literary sources of the expectation we know, and of the sporadic ebullition of it we have evidence. But that the idea was so widespread and influential that every new teacher of religion must concern himself with it and fashion his gospel by it—this requires demonstration. And so, for the present, every study of Jesus must be provisional.

If the publishers can succeed in bringing this volume to the notice of the many who, we are sure, would be glad of it, a second edition will soon be wanted. Then the following slips can be corrected. The map of Palestine (it is a good one, but not coloured), which p. 20 tells us is at the end of the book, is at the beginning of our copy. On p. 22 the statement that "son-of-man" is found for the first time in Daniel vii. 14 overlooks its common occurrence in Ezekiel; we will not suppose that M. Giran puts Daniel before Ezekiel. On p. 24 the date of Josephus is given as 37 B.C.; it should be A.D., and the year of his death should be added. On p. 33 the word "idem" refers to a passage which is not cited till p. 34. And in the footnote on p. 35 a "not" has crept into the third line to make nonsense.

From many lands, afar and near,
We come, O God, to sing Thy praise,
The Sacred Presence to revere,
The anthem of the truth to raise.

That truth in differing phrase is taught,
As, gathered under various skies,
The seekers after Thee have caught
The messages of paradise.

May myriad voices still proclaim
The word which sets Thy children free,
Uniting creeds of every name
To seek Thy glorious liberty.

Come, Pentecostal Spirit, come,
Touch prayer and utterance with Thy
That every heart may feel at home, [flame,
And catch the accents of Thy name.

BENJAMIN REYNOLDS BULKELEY.

WHAT does the American Unitarian Association mean by announcing in its autumn list "The Life Superlative" as "the last book that will ever be issued, in all probability, over the name of Stopford A. Brooke"? And, again, in an advertisement of the book in the Christian Register, of October 24, "the last volume to bear this gifted preacher and author's name"? "The Life Superlative" was published last year, a book for which Mr. Stopford Brooke was only indirectly responsible, but now in the "Studies in Poetry," just issued by Messrs. Duckworth & Co., we have already another substantial volume from his pen, and there is every reason to hope that Mr. Brooke has still further volumes of Shakespeare and other literary studies in store for us.

OBITUARY.

ALGERNON SYDNEY FIELD.

MR. ALGERNON SYDNEY FIELD, who died at his residence, Blackdown Hill, Leamington, on October 31, aged 94 years, was the fourth and last surviving son of the Rev. William Field, Unitarian Minister at Warwick. Educated by his father, whose school at Leam, near Warwick, attracted many subsequently prominent members of the Unitarian body, Mr. Field was articled to his eldest brother, the late Edwin Wilkins Field, of Hampstead and Lincoln's Inn Fields.

Admitted a solicitor in 1834, Mr. Field commenced, and has ever since carried on professional practice at Leamington, for the latter portion of his life in partnership with his two sons. His high character, sound judgment, and honourable professional career earned universal respect, and in 1874 he was appointed by the late Lord Leigh to be Clerk of the Peace for Warwickshire, to which office the Local Government Act, of 1888, added that of Clerk of the County Council. The esteem and regard in which Mr. Field was held found expression in a presentation made to him in 1896 on the occasion of his golden wedding, by the magistrates and County Councillors.

Through his paternal grandmother, Ann Cromwell, Mr. Field traced direct descent from the Protector. He married in 1846 Sarah, daughter of John Martin, of Birmingham, and leaves a surviving family of two sons and two daughters, bound to him by the closest ties of love and reverence. Mrs. Field died in 1900.

THE REV. WILLIAM JAMES, J.P.

WE recorded last week the great loss sustained by our churches in South Wales through the death of the Rev. William James, of Llandyssul. To the general public the notice of the sad event came very unexpectedly, but ever since the exertions involved in his attendance at the Welsh Church Commission, in February last, Mr. James's strength had been steadily failing. After that trying experience he was never the same man again, and the end came on Saturday, October 26, at his residence at Brynhyfryd, Llandyssul.

William James was the son of the late John and Elizabeth James, and was born April 13, 1848, at Camnantfach, Llandyssul, which was the scene of one of the tragedies of the political struggles of 1868-76, when Mr. James and his family were evicted because he recorded his vote according to the dictates of his conscience, instead of at the bidding of his landlord. It is significant of the changes which have since taken place in the district that our friend's son-in-law is now resident owner of Camnant.

Mr. James received his education at the Rhydown Grammar School under the Rev. T. Thomas; became a student at the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, 1863-6, at Manchester New College, in London, 1866-9. After a year at Edinburgh, 1869-70, he took his London B.A. degree in 1871. Having taught for a short time in the Rev. George Heaviside's school at Coventry, and then, until the end of 1872, at the Rhydown Grammar School, he spent seven happy, useful years in charge of the Old Meeting House congregation and school at Aberdare. His first sermon was preached January 19, 1873, and his last October 5, 1879. From Aberdare he went to take the joint charge of the churches of Llwynrhydown, Bwlch-y-fadfa and Graig, Llandyssul, and of the school, in succession to the Rev. William Thomas (Gwilym Marles), who had been compelled to resign his charge owing to failing health, brought on by anxiety in connection with the eviction of himself and congregation from Llwynrhydown in 1876. The heavy work in connection with his many duties proved too much for Mr. James, so that after four years he had to give up his school, and in 1888 his pulpits also. This enforced retirement was very much against his wish and inclination, and it implied no slackening of the deep interest he felt in the welfare of the denomination. With more time on his hands he was able to pay more attention to the public good.

He was for several years from 1882 examiner in science and mathematics at the Presbyterian College; secretary of the South Wales Unitarian Association, 1894-1907, and president, 1901-2; he became a manager of the Ministers' Sustentation Fund in succession to Rev. T. Thomas in 1904; J.P. of the county of Cardigan, 1895; member of the Llandysul School Board, 1894, also of the County School, and chairman in 1900.

Mr. James was always anxious to further the advancement of true religion. After his retirement from the ministry he preached from time to time both at home and elsewhere, and frequently with all the energy and vigour that characterised his earlier life. He was always a favourite at quarterly meetings, and his business qualifications made him a valuable acquisition as secretary of the Association. He was a great reader, and had a splendid memory. This served him in good stead when he undertook the editorship of Yr Ymofynydd (1904-7). In the pages of that popular little magazine he chatted month by month, in a delightfully entertaining fashion, in a column bearing the title of "The Crow's Nest." He was familiar with the results of recent Biblical criticism and put his knowledge to good use. His sermon on "The Future of Religion in Wales," preached before the Welsh Association in 1895, was published twice; and his lessons on Mark and Luke, for the use of Sunday-schools, are the best of their kind in the Welsh language.

Mr. James entered keenly into politics. He was from deep conviction a strong supporter of the Liberal party in Wales. His clear grasp of the political situation, his power and influence as an orator and a man, and his readiness to help, made him invaluable in such public service. He was a man of strong and attractive personality. He roused interest by his conversation, which was a charming mixture of intellect, wit, kindly criticism, and varied knowledge; he appealed to the affections by his deep and wide sympathies and his own warm heart. He will long be remembered for his high ideals, pure integrity and the influence of his beautiful character, his boundless charity, and deep-rooted faith in God and goodness.

On July, 1877, Mr. James married Sarah, the elder daughter of the Rev. Owen Evans of Cefncoed, a sister of the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Bury. With her and their son and two daughters (one of whom is the wife of the Rev. T. A. Thomas, of Llandyssul) the keenest sympathy is felt.

On Wednesday, October 30, after a short service in the house, conducted by the Rev. R. C. Jones, a great gathering of relatives and friends left Brynhyfryd for Pantyde-faid, a distance of three or four miles, in a continuous downpour of rain. At the chapel the Rev. J. H. Davies took the first part of the funeral service, and the Rev. R. J. Jones, of Aberdare, gave a short address. At the graveside the Rev. John Davies, the venerable friend and fellow-student of the deceased, spoke the words of faith and comfort.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE LITTLE CRIPPLE.

THE children were in the bay window with their mother, looking out at the sunset glow on the heather and ferns that carpeted the common beyond the garden.

"See," said Mrs. Weldon, "how pink the heather looks and how bright the green of the ferns is! They like the evening kiss of the sun, when he says good-night before he goes to bed."

"That's like us, mummy; we like you to come up and kiss us good-night before we go to sleep," said Lilian.

"Look," cried Tommy, "at that jolly little chap jumping about over the heather, isn't he just happy! There—now he is standing still and laughing back at his daddy. Now he is running on again; I think he is playing horses."

"Yes, that's it," said Lilian. "Now he is pretending he is stopping at a house; now he is tossing his head and going on again; and now he is round the corner, out of sight."

"I should like to play with him," said Tommy.

For a minute or two there was silence. Then Lilian cried out:

"Here comes another little boy. Oh, look, mummy; he is going on crutches, he has only got one leg!"

Mrs. Weldon looked up, and saw a little fellow not more than five or six years old hopping down the steep path that led across the common to the road below. His mother walked on rapidly, wheeling his little wicker mail-cart, and he was trying hard to keep by her side. His little crutches flashed in the sunlight like the oars of a boat, as he worked them to and fro, with his one poor little leg hopping between them, a little bit of it bare and gleaming between the knicker and the sock. But it was such a short little leg, there wasn't much of it to show, and it was pitiful to see how hard it worked.

"How his shoulders must ache," said Mrs. Weldon; "and see, the crutches push them up so high that his white blouse and the rim of his sailor hat almost touch. Poor little boy, how manfully he works along!"

"I should call it 'boyfully,' mummy," said Tom.

"Well, that's rather a good word, for boys can be every bit as brave as men. There! Now he has stopped to rest, and his mother looks round, stops a second, and then goes quickly on again. She is cruel, but she doesn't mean it, she doesn't know how hard it is to go on crutches downhill on rough ground."

"Now he is hurrying after her, but he can't quite catch her up. Poor little boy, she isn't kind!" said Lilian.

Mrs. Weldon did not speak at once, for there were tears in her eyes and a lump in her throat, and she couldn't.

Then she said: "I think that little boy's mother is vexed that he has not got two legs, like other little boys—I do not think she feels enough for him. He will want all his bravery through life. He will never be able to play games and run and jump like the other little boy we saw, and when he is a man he will find it hard to earn his living. He will never be like other people."

"Oh, mummy," said Tom, "how glad I am that we are not like that."

"Yes, dear, but be thankful to God as well as glad. It might easily have been you, and it may be you some day. Once upon a time a great and good man stood watching a wretched thief going to prison with a crowd around him. 'But for the grace of God,' said the good man, 'there go I!' He meant that he might have been in that man's place. And so, dears, when we see anyone ill or hurt or lame, let us try to think what it feels like, and remember it might, but for the grace of God, have been ourselves. And then we shall want to do what we can to help them and make them happy."

"I think," said Lilian, "I should like to make friends with that poor little boy, and give him—what shall I give him? My ball?"

"No," said Tommy, "he couldn't play at ball."

"Well, then, my dominoes."

And Lilian did.

VIOLET SOLLY.

HYMN.

(Written for the Boston International.)

Kingdom of God! the day how blest
When to Thy fold as to their home,
From north and south, from east and west,
Thine own of every name shall come!

Day of the Lord! thine hour draws nigh,
We see the radiant dawn afar;
The light of truth illumines the sky,
Resplendent as the morning star.

Not ours the noon, but ours the dawn,
The prelude to the full-orbed day;
And ours to bid the clouds be gone,
And give the light unhindered way.

All glory, gracious God, to Thee!
We lift our eyes unto the hills,
And lo! the blessed prophecy,
By Thy strong arm, its course fulfils.

BEFORE THE OPENING

LAST April, on the eve of the hundred and second anniversary of Dr. MARTINEAU's birth, the foundation-stone of the Martineau Memorial buildings in connection with the Octagon Chapel at Norwich was laid by his daughter. Next Thursday the buildings are to be opened by Sir JOHN BRUNNER. What we have to ask, at the moment, of those who rejoice that fitting honour should be done to a great name, and a worthy memorial of a revered and beloved teacher be raised in the city of his birth, is this: Are these buildings to be opened free from debt, or not? Mrs. MOTTRAM, the devoted hon. secretary of the Memorial Fund, made a statement in these columns on October 12, and a very earnest appeal for the final £400, which with the further £500 undertaken by the Octagon congregation, would complete the fund. In response to that appeal the following are the promises of further donations which have been received; most of them, if not all, from friends who have already given once or more than once before to the fund:—

Mr. P. J. Worsley	25	0	0
Miss S. S. Dowson	10	0	0
Miss M. C. Martineau	10	0	0
Miss Edith Gittins	3	3	0
Miss Catherine Scott	3	0	0
Mrs. Marriott	2	2	0
Miss H. R. Greg	2	2	0
Miss Ruth Nettlefold	2	2	0
Mr. S. Gilfillan	1	1	0
Mr. A. S. Thew	1	1	0
Mrs. Enfield	1	1	0
Mrs. Shannon	1	1	0
Miss Constance Bolingbroke	1	1	0
Mr. G. W. Chitty	1	0	0
Miss Jane Higinbotham	0	10	6
Miss Fullagar	0	10	0
Miss Toulmin Smith	0	7	6
Miss S. Maughan	0	5	0
A Friend	0	5	0

That is £103 12s., leaving £296 8s. still to be given. We simply state the fact, and ask: Ought not the Martineau Memorial to be opened free from debt

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

LETTER OF GREETING TO THE UNITARIANS OF CANADA.

IN our report of the Council meeting of this Association last week we recorded the resolution to send a letter of greeting to each of the Canadian churches, after the recent visit of representatives of the Association, in connection with the International meetings in Boston. The following is the text of the letter:—

"To the Unitarians of Canada.

"DEAR BRETHREN,—Our representatives, the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, C. J. Street, W. G. Tarrant, W. W. C. Pope, and Mr. H. B. Lawford, have reported to us, with grateful unanimity, the deep impressions received by them during their recent visit to your country. To dwellers in our crowded cities the spectacle of a vast and generous land like yours, and the stirring life of your vigorous national youth, could not fail to be greatly stimulating; and we take this opportunity, as citizens of the Home Country, to greet you, our brethren across the sea, and to congratulate you on the magnificent progress already made in developing the rich resources of the soil, and in rearing healthful and beautiful homes where human life may reach its best.

"To you, who are one with us in the desire and the effort to infuse the spirit of a free religion into the minds and hearts of men, we look with special gladness and yearning. You who are pioneers of civilisation are also, we believe, pioneers of a new day in the history of Christendom, a day which will bring more and more glory on its name as the shadows of ignorance, fear, and superstition are lifted away from the souls of men. Already, during two generations, you, our brethren in Montreal and Toronto, have verified in no small degree the hopes of the brave men and women who founded your congregational life. You, our brethren in Ottawa, Hamilton, London, and Winnipeg, cannot but feel fresh impulse to your own vigorous enthusiasm as you observe the achievements of these elder sister churches. With all of you we earnestly hope and believe that, as with your great country, so with the great faith we share, there awaits a nobly fruitful future if only they who enjoy its blessings are faithful in its service.

"In the name of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association we beg you to accept our warmest thanks for the abounding cordiality of your welcome to its representatives and to the other Unitarians from these shores who had the privilege of meeting you face to face. You may be assured that their memory of this delightful experience will long endure, and that through them our whole fellowship on this side will be bound henceforth in intimate sympathy and friendship with yours. We trust that the tie so happily knit will be a source of strength and inspiration to us and to you for many years to come.

"Wishing you sincerely 'God-speed,' we are, on behalf of the Association,—Yours fraternally,

WILLIAM B. BOWRING,

President.

HOWARD CHATFIELD CLARK,

Treasurer.

W. COPELAND BOWIE,

Secretary."

THE FALL OF THE LEAF.

AMONG the sad and pensive sentences in the Bible, confessions of human impotence and sin, and bewailings over the transitoriness of life, are some that we cherish surely for something besides their candour. Is it because a faithful observation is expressed through an image that is beautiful? The despondent gloom of the last chapter of Ecclesiastes haunts the memory with a sense of the solace of grey shadows rather than with any apparition of terror of desolation. The mention of sun and moon and stars projects a beam of light across the sky, although they are doomed to be darkened. The clouds of portent are approaching, we are told; but they come in majesty and with glistening shoulders. We are awed, not horrified. Though summoned to express sadness, we cannot hear the voice of a bird or of the daughters of music, or behold the almond tree in blossom, without mingling joy with our melancholy; and though the silver cord be loosed, and the golden bowl be broken, the cord is of silver, we bear in mind, and the bowl is of gold; and the pitcher which is destined to be broken is the symbol of homely life, and the wheel is the wheel of earnest industry. These are things dear to memory, and which chasten the heart. Even the dust of mortality that falls back upon the earth in due time will yield its fragrance to the skies, and so the very language of melancholy is antidote to the message it conveys. We, children of nature, are forbidden to think far away from the habits of thought which nature herself has adopted, and these are gracious and beautiful. Thus, though the autumn branches, growing daily more transparent, remind us that "we all do fade as a leaf," we are comforted and cheered rather than otherwise by the reminder. It is true. It is also beautifully true. What words other than goodly and "comfortable" words could leaves ever utter. Like Lowell, we love to hear the rustling of those that have fallen. They are still so full of movement and music. Do they remind us of our mortality? It is pleasant to think upon. Their ruddy visage puts health into our pallid thoughts. Do we indeed fade like the leaves? What more could we desire? If thus we accomplish our dissolution there shall be nothing in it but glory and honour; a goal to look forward to rather than a fate to fear.

Look at the whinberry laid now like a rich carpet over the moors; at the bramble blazing crimson along the wayside; at the bracken breaking away from the feet of the solemn pine trees and pouring like a fiery cataract down the hill. In no measured splendour does the green leaf depart, but to its rest it goes with the royal purple and gold of a king.

It were no unwholesome ambition to desire to fade as a leaf, for this cannot be done save first we have lived as a leaf. For the leaf that fades gloriously is the healthy leaf on the healthy tree that withers and falls at its proper season. Break off a green branch. The leaves will shrivel. They will not fade in nature's fine and gradual way. They will not even fall. Let a tree in full foliage be smitten by lightning, or let it die either by the worm or the fungus, and you shall see no splendour. The leaf dies as it has lived, and fairly at its proper season. It is not otherwise with man. "Our people die well," said Wesley, in defence of the Methodists. It was a solid apology, for none can die finely who live not finely, who think to slip away carrying no credentials of service faithfully rendered.

Here is a brown, dry, wrinkled elm-leaf. What a cope of saffron samite it lately hung over the shoulders of the great elm-tree. I see at a glance that now it is aged and tanned, horny and wrinkled with work, like an honest old weather-beaten face that has stood the gales of winter and is scarred by many a care. These lines and stains are a record of how quietly and orderly this leaf has done what it has done. It has only seemed to be playing all the while it was so seriously industrious. It has been beguiling us and making us fancy that its sole concern was to be at once the green flag waving and a cymbal tinkling in the wind,—a creature of pleasure casting a comfortable shade. After all, that is no bad style in which to work, provided one be such a master of his actions that he can lightly accomplish them,—to labour sternly while hiding every semblance of toil, keeping face bright and tongue merry so that folk shall take it as a matter of play.

The function of a leaf is manifold. It is the mouth, the lungs, and the stomach of the tree. Wonderful is its structure of cells and veins, nerves and pores, stretched on a framework of tough, elastic fibres. Its envelope is pierced with numerous minute apertures, the stomata or mouths.

It is the filter and purifier of the atmosphere. The tainted air that we exhale with every breath it inhales, and by help of that great chemist the sun, decomposes it in its laboratory of green cells, taking from it its poisonous load of carbon dioxide, and giving us back the vital oxygen. And with the carbon thus extracted it makes the wood and the bark of the tree. Through cell and channel it is passed, down the leaf-stalk into the branch, and thence some will go on descending into the trunk and be deposited immediately beneath the bark to harden into timber. Another current will pass to the growing fruit and help to make the seed and the wholesome pulp that covers it. All this is effected not by the leaves alone, but by co-operation with the roots, which, drawing up moisture from the soil, send it up to combine with the materials collected by the leaves from the atmosphere. Yet nearly half the weight of wood in trees is made up of the carbon thus obtained by the leaves, and which, if left in the atmosphere, would be poison to us. Is it hard to believe that they with their microscopic mouths can take in and digest all the solid material which is needed for the building of the trees of the forest? We fail to realise how many leaves a tree may have. It may be only as they are fluttering down covering garden and road and meadow that we begin to conceive how many they are, and what a surface they would cover if laid together side by side. It has been estimated that one large elm-tree contained five acres of leaves; five acres of lip and mouth incessantly at work. Another kind of industry which these now tired and fallen leaves have been performing has been to moisten the atmosphere; a service most vigorously rendered during the hot, dry weather when it is most needed. The sap that enters through the rootlets and rises up the trunk and branches would not rise at all were it not for the open lips of the leaves which let it escape in vapour like the breath that escapes from between our own lips.

The moist atmosphere of a woodland country is thus easily accounted for, where over every acre of woodland the trees are pumping up from the soil and transpiring from their foliage no less than 800 barrels of water every twenty-four hours.

And now we are getting the bare boughs exposed we have nought to complain of or to regret. Next to the beauty of the trees in spring and autumn is their beauty in the winter. Look at that network of branch and twig on the oak or the plane tree, as ingenious in variety as it is delicate in design. It is the industrial exhibit of the handiwork of the tree, for a score or two, it may be, or, perhaps, for centuries of summers. All this is the work which if the leaves had not effected they would not have faded or fallen in the manner they have done. They have sacrificed to the future, and their sacrifice has been the means of handsomely celebrating their exit. For owing to their contribution to the substance of the tree there have been formed buds which next year will be the leaves in their places; and it is none other than this slowly swelling, advancing bud which the leaf has been building at the base of its own stalk which at length tilts off its parent and predecessor. The leaf has by now grown ready for the change—it declares the fact by its radiant and sanguine colour, gained, as one has suggested, by borrowing of late "less from the earth and more from heaven." Thus, these leaves now falling around us, so decorative and playful, have, under their fine colours, and in spite of their gleeful flutter, been doing invaluable service, cleansing the atmosphere, moistening it with vapour and manufacturing timber. Types of the cheerful, unsuspected, genuine workers among mankind, the loving hearts and busy hands whose labours are none the less beautiful for being commonplace or less practical by reason of their gentle ways and rhythmic order. Upon such it is that the real glory of the autumn leaf descends, enriching them with no false praise or clattering applause, but burnishing their spirits with the glory of the faith and the love and the duty that is in them. It is they who, like the leaves, do purify the atmosphere of the world; who give us our best, most constant stimulus to growth and progress, and who help to form within us, yet without advertisement, the fibres of character—that timber of life of which all noble achievements are built.

Would we fade as the leaf? We must live as the leaf. Fade? It fades not, but is lit up with the ineffaceable impression of things well and rightly done, and with the beauty that comes of hope of which it has already formed the bud, a hope, the gentle exertion of which is the instrument of its own release.

NORTH MIDLAND ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

IN the beautiful and commodious premises of Kettering-road Church, Northampton, the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association held its annual meetings on Wednesday and Thursday, October 30 and 31. The gatherings were remarkable for their enthusiasm and interest. On Wednesday evening the Northampton friends had arranged a delightful reception for the ministers and delegates. All the arrangements were admirable, and a very happy evening was spent, brightened by excellent music and encouraging speeches.

On Thursday morning the annual business meeting, attended by a good muster of ministers and delegates, was held.

The treasurer's financial statement showed a deficit of over £50, and a strong appeal was made to wipe off this debt. The retiring president, Mr. Wm. Moss, of Loughborough, handed over £10 as a donation, and it is hoped that his generous example will be followed by others, so that the new financial year may open, not with a deficit, but with a balance in hand. The secretary's report complained of the lack of effective enthusiasm. "With too few exceptions, the churches are content to foster their own separate interests and to labour for their own individual prosperity, without evident concern for the welfare of the sister churches, and without much tribulation of soul over that great and ever-increasing number of men who have deserted the churches and ignored the claims of religious institutions to be reckoned as serious factors in the moral and material elevation of the multitude.

... There is great reason to fear that this is mainly due to a spirit of indifference towards our aims and objects, to the lack of any imaginative or inspiring vision of the corporate life and function of our churches, and to the failure to realise in any vital way the unique opportunities now presented for a vigorous missionary enterprise."

"Van Mission.—A glimpse of the wider outlook and the nobler zeal was disclosed by the Van Mission, which has aroused so much public attention in many parts of the country, and which paid welcome visits to the North Midlands. . . . The unanimous opinion appears to be that the mission reaches a class of men (the overwhelming majority of the people) that our organised churches, by their regular worship and preaching, are incapable of touching. The mission brings our ministers and laymen face to face, and heart to heart with a new audience eager and hungry for some word of life. The Van Mission not only delivers a message to the labouring classes, but receives from the labouring classes a quickening revelation of the actual needs and interests of the democracy."

The report referred sympathetically to the deaths of Mr. E. Clephan, of Leicester, one of its vice-presidents, and of the Rev.

W. W. Robinson, of Gainborough, and offered a welcome to the Rev. Charles Sneddon, of Christ Church, Nottingham. After an appreciative and grateful reference to the work of the Rev. W. H. Burgess, at Loughborough, it is reported that the friends at Coalville continue to form an enthusiastic fellowship, and that the movement has now been formally affiliated with the association. Burton disappears from the list of churches. "The friends at Burton have failed to win new allies, and now report that the class of people with whom they are associated. . . . are more strongly attracted by the Labour Church, which appears to be very vigorous and flourishing. Although Burton thus falls out of our list, the movement must not be regarded as vain, if it has in any way contributed to the forces that make for the moral uplifting of the town."

After paying a warm tribute of thanks to the Lay Preachers' Union, the report concludes thus:—

"Although it has been necessary to open this report with a note of grave misgiving, the committee feel they cannot close without striking a more resonant and hopeful chord. In looking abroad over the religious world and estimating the opportunities before our churches, the committee are profoundly encouraged by the rapid development of progressive thought in every direction. Since the last annual report was presented there has been an extraordinary quickening of vitality in the Liberal Christian Movement. Early in the spring the sensational advocacy of the 'New Theology' caused much salutary agitation in the ranks of Protestant orthodoxy and held for some time the attention of the whole country. A movement similarly significant in character, and even more portentous for the future of Christian theology, has stirred the traditional Church of Rome to the depths. The emergence of 'Modernism' among Roman Catholics has caused nothing less than consternation in the Vatican, and given rise to reprisals in the most violent Papal denunciation, and the most rigorous ecclesiastical coercion of recent times. The Pope's encyclical, as Father Tyrrell, one of the Modernists thus severely censured, says, bears reluctant testimony to the astounding energy, versatility and diffusion of the new thought. But the victorious advance of Truth cannot be stayed by any ecclesiastical methods, however harsh and mediæval, and the liberal influence will continue to leaven all the churches until in the general break-up of orthodoxy the necessity for a full and frank reconstruction of doctrine is honestly faced. This universal disintegration of dogma closely and vitally affects the life of our churches and opens to them a wider field of action. Nor can the committee overlook the significance of the meetings of the 'International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers' recently held in Boston, U.S.A. These meetings were attended by a number of ministers and laymen from the North Midland district. At these gatherings they had the privilege of meeting brethren of like intellectual and spiritual affinities from communions varying from the Roman Catholic Church to churches of recognised liberal sympathies. Such signs of the times must confirm and encourage us in our Free Christian principles and urge us powerfully to a deepened devotion to 'Truth, to Liberty, to Religion.' The outlook inspires us to realise that instead of being a defeated and negligible body, we are already in the forefront of a triumphant and world-wide movement. Our comrades and well-wishers are more numerous and influential than we know. The freedom for which others are still fighting so strenuously is even now our assured and priceless inheritance. The call to us, therefore, is to be more faithful in labour, more abounding in self-sacrifice, more constant in prayer and worship. We may look upwards and onwards, believing that our long night's vigil is all but over, that the dawn of a new day is breaking, and that we may enter joyfully and bravely into the greatness of the promise, 'Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom.'"

The new president, Mr. A. H. Paget, of Leicester, and the officers and committee were then elected.

In the afternoon the Rev. F. Heming Vaughan, of Mansfield, read an extremely fine and forcible paper on "Our opportunity," which caused something approaching a sensation, and was reported and commented on in some of the London papers. We can only give here a short summary, but it was suggested that the paper should be published by the Social Questions Sub-Committee, in which case our readers will be able to read it in full.

Our Opportunity.

England, said Mr. Vaughan, is in the throes of a Titanic industrial struggle. The nation is gathering into two armed camps of capital and labour. The evils of wealth and poverty are sapping the life of our people. Thousands are destroying their souls in luxury, and millions are living starved and stunted lives. The work in shop and factory is soul-killing. It deadens the higher faculties. The unity of family life is threatened.

These are not statements made by a red-hot agitator, but the observations of sober writers like Marshall. What is the position of the Christian Church? She is a derelict. "The great masses," says Mr. C. Booth, "remain apart from all forms of religious communion." The people are busy outside organising themselves to break the chains of economic slavery. The church gave them no assistance during the inhuman establishment of the factory system, and they no longer look to her for help and guidance. A prominent Socialist writer, Mr. R. Blatchford, has fiercely repudiated Christianity on the ground that it is in the way of humanity, and his writings are eagerly bought. The churches have gravely replied to his theological objections, whereas the book, "God and My Neighbour," is a moral indictment of organised Christianity for bowing the knee to Mammon. The book can only be answered by deeds. The real failure of the churches is not a theological but a moral failure—it sheds no light on the moral issues of the day. Men are busy preaching salvation through economic machinery. Socialism comes, like the Pied Piper, piping the way to a joyous life, and harassed workers, unable to find hope elsewhere, follow gladly. But many clear-sighted reformers see that moral force alone can compel an economic improvement. They are appealing to the churches of Christ for help. What help can the churches bring? Not economic wisdom, but moral courage. They have this moral force in Christ if they will let his conscience move them. Then they will see their duty. It is not the duty of the churches to ally themselves with Socialism nor anti-Socialism. Their duty is to take up in the name of Christ the demand of justice behind the Socialist movement—that every man shall have the material conditions of a complete life, and burn that demand of brotherhood and divine sonship into the consciences of politicians and citizens. Leaving the other churches to the conscience of their Master, we must inquire how we are facing this crisis. Our official report fills one with dismay. The executive committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in this time of sheer indifference to any organised religion, talk about "the need of protesting against theological doctrines which have not ceased to affect the minds and hearts of men." But in our recent Van experience there was no such suffering. On the contrary, the few who believed in anything rejoiced in their doctrines—some found great comfort in the devil. The time has come, not for protesting, but witnessing to any definite religious faith with power to mould the consciences of men.

Our National Conference offers no better help. They apparently (vide reply to Boston International Congress letter) stand for nothing and rejoice "in the spontaneous development of religious thought and life"! It is difficult to understand how anyone can interpret the interference of the Christ life through the centuries as "spontaneous." Weeds may grow spontaneously, but the fair product of Christian character needs intensive culture. This fallacy of spontaneous development survives in our midst from the nineteenth century, and is blighting our churches. Our religion is frankly individualistic, and each man's conscience is the law divine. Our sittings are taken, but the seats are unoccupied. We are riddled with scepticism and indifference. There is no help for the redemption of the world along this line. And yet we possess in Unitarian Christianity a unique power if we could only be converted to its truth and combine in its power. The future lies with organised effort, as the secular world is proving. Our future lies in a church, an organised body, in that corporate life for which Mr. Lloyd Thomas pleads in his "Free Catholic Church." But such a union can only come through the uniting power of a definite religious belief. We cannot organise round abstractions as we have hitherto tried to do. We must use our freedom to combine round "the main features of Christian doctrine as well as the essentials of Christian life." We must abandon our superstitious dread of doctrine and authority and be dogmatic and obedient over the essence instead of the circumference of Christianity. We have found that essence in the two doctrines of Divine Fatherhood and human brotherhood. But as Dr. Mellone shows, these truths are powerless apart from Christ, in whom they were embodied, and in those who have been moulded by his conscience. Their power "is not logical and abstract, but comes through human life—the minds that have held them, the souls they have subdued"—in brief, the church. Our force will come not in seeking to emphasise our separateness from the Christian church, but in preserving our organic connection and in the power of that Catholic life welding ourselves into living obedience to Christ our Head, and showing in our lives the truth of the doctrines we parade. The world does not doubt our gospel, it is only sceptical of its realisation in human life—and the state of our churches helps its scepticism.

The need is great to present the life of Christ as the realisation of our gleaming ideal, and by its very humanity binding on us. Then through our altered lives we should have gained moral power to hold aloft the "objective conscience" of Christ as the standard for every man. The individual is powerless, however, to do this. It can only be done through the church.

In this church of Unitarian Christians, of men baptised in the Master's spirit, educating their consciences by what is divine and authoritative in his conscience, there would be such a moral force as to compel attention. It would draw the hearts of men and move their wills to establish the conditions of a complete life for each man, which would be the advent of the Kingdom. Woe unto us if we are too selfish and cowardly to accept this opportunity.

This was followed by an interesting discussion which went with striking unanimity in support of the paper.

In the evening a religious service was held, conducted by the Rev. A. Hermann Thomas, of Leicester, and the annual sermon was preached by Principal J. Estlin Carpenter, of Manchester College, Oxford. "Fellow citizens with the saints and of the household of God" was the text.

The greatest praise and thanks are due to the Northampton friends for the great warmth and unstinted generosity of their welcome.

THE EUSTON THEATRE SERVICES.

Two of the announced series of services at the Euston Theatre, conducted by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, have been held, each attended by nearly one thousand persons. On the first Sunday everything was simply perfect (so says our eager correspondent): a radiantly happy and intently interested audience, good music, ardent singing, and searching but winsome teaching. On the second occasion a cluster of lads created a slight disturbance, but this was soon overcome, and all went well. Enough has happened to make it once more certain that the multitude beyond the pale of church and chapel only wait for a brotherly and rational lead in order to come within the larger lines of humanitarian religion.

On the second Sunday, without being combative, Mr. Page Hopps spoke very plainly about certain dominant settings forth of religion which ought long ago to have been dropped. We wanted, he said, a religion for common life, a religion related to common things, without puzzles, without priests, and without fear. Religion was simply the outreaching after the highest and the best, or might even be sufficiently present in a life that was given up to patient and faithful service, though on a very homely plane. In that way, religion was possible for every one, and it was arguable that a willing girl who, in a poor shop, served food to working men, was as clearly acting out a religion as the priest who fumbled with bread and wine at the altar.

IS THERE LIFE TO ORGANISE?

SIR,—Some remarks which I made at the evening meeting of the Provincial Assembly at Hampstead were misunderstood. That in itself is of no account. I have no importance that I should think it necessary to point out such a fact publicly. I only do so because what I wished to say is, I venture to believe, important. The position was that the Rev. Joseph Wood had, in his paper, urged organisation as a remedy for many of the ills from which we are suffering. In reply to that I raised the question whether there is anything to organise. Organisation is the means which a strongly self-conscious movement takes of expressing itself and effecting its purposes. Is there among us such a unitary self-consciousness needing utterance? I submit that there is not. Our loyalty to a principle of freedom is in itself abstract and negative. What the application of the principle leads to is the vital matter. One thing is certain, it issues in very considerable intellectual differences, which are not indeed to be exaggerated, any more than they are to be minimised. We stand, it is said, for spiritual things, for worship, for brotherhood, for love. That is all well and good, but it is vague, and needs to be given a fuller content. Indeed, it is just in giving precision to the ideas of brotherhood and love that what hope there is for us lies. My point, in fact, was this:—There is a notable movement on foot in the world for the fuller realisation of life on the part, I believe, of all sections of the community. The thought of the poor rushes to mind at once. But I include the rich. It is the significant factor in the life of our time. And it seems to me obvious that the fate of any church, which is the world's self-expression in its reverence for and reaching after the ideal, is bound up inevitably with its attitude to this struggle towards light and freedom. Its opportunity is the prophets', first to penetrate with a divine sympathy to the heart of the movement, to seize its meaning, and then to interpret it to itself. If we are God's self-revelation to the world, the actual world of this present day, there is no doubt as to our future. If we, on the other hand, are deaf to the call of the time, if we are blind to what is most significant in it, if party and class interests, prejudices, and passions keep us out of the main stream, then we may have private chapels and private chaplaincies in odd corners of the world, but we have no mission to the great mass of men who want to know what the divine spirit means in the passion for a universal perfection which more and more strongly moves within them. It is no relevant criticism to cry that this is Socialism, and that religion cannot split itself up into parties with social programmes. I was understood to be asking that Unitarian and Socialist should be convertible terms. I meant nothing of the kind. I don't even know that I am a Socialist. Certainly I am not according to some definitions of that badly-abused word. I do say that to be a brother, to love our neighbour as ourself is to desire for him, and to labour that he may have, to penetrate society with the loving will, in order to make possible to him the best that we wish and seek for ourselves. It should be an outrage on the Christian conscience that any man should fall short of the possibilities God has locked up in his soul through any selfishness of ours or of society. The realisation that the utmost fullness of life is God's will for everyone seems to me to be the essence of democracy, and the taking that up into the teaching and life of the Church, as God's revelation, the paramount necessity of the present age. This is the spiritual element with which religion may do much to saturate the minds of all classes, and which seems to me to be essential to any form of religion that is to influence and lead the modern man Godward. My belief is that our churches have not felt this, that we are not as one man moved by it, and that, therefore, split up as we are into differences on all hands except the negative point of liberty, there is no such passion of the self-conscious life of the whole as brings the panacea of organisation within the realm of practical politics. Life will speedily organise itself. And life, the divine life of our time, we lack. Such at least is my diagnosis when I think of our churches as a whole, a judgment, needless to say, not true by any means of all our churches, or probably of some individuals in every church.

COTTON MATHER.

SIR,—Two letters, ascribed to Cotton Mather, have lately appeared in your columns. While we cannot but smile at the clever roguery of their wording, and admire the grave face with which the jest is carried through, it still seems well to protest against such liberties being taken with the name of a worthy divine, who is no longer able to defend himself against practical jokes.

SOUTHEND HOLIDAY HOME.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

SIR,—Mrs. Bayle Bernard's little cottage home by the sea has again during the year received its many visitors, scholars and teachers, from the London Sunday Schools, and good reports have been received from several telling of their improved health, and of the comfort and happiness enjoyed during their stay.

Some necessary exceptional expenses have been incurred for painting and repairs, and a charge has been made by the Town Council for share of cost of making up the road, meaning a call upon the treasurer of £24 beyond the ordinary outgoings.

Will friends of the London schools help the treasurer to meet this extra claim?

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Aberdeen.—Anniversary services were conducted on Sunday, October 26, by the Rev. F. Walters, and on November 3 by the Rev. Walter Walsh, of Dundee. On Monday evening the annual soiree was held in the Church Hall, which was crowded. The chair was taken by Rev. A. Webster, and he was accompanied on the platform by the Rev. A. Brown, St. Paul-street Congregational Church, Rev. C. Mackie, Drumoak, Mr. G. Bissett, and the leading officials of the congregation. After tea, the Chairman expressed his pleasure in being back to his sphere of work after an absence of eleven Sundays. He was glad to find that the life of the church had been actively maintained. Reviewing the past year, he said:—"The building of our church has been amply justified. It has regenerated the congregation, renewed its energies, and added greatly to its membership. The church is the only one in the city which originated, and is maintained on free, rational, and progressive lines. I would all other churches were such. All others are tending that way, emerging slowly from the bondage of tradition and dogmatic dictation. Ours, however, has the distinction of being the pioneer church, and it must continue its witness-bearing to unfettered thought and a religion true to the highest knowledge and the holiest faith." With reference to the International Congress of Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, which he attended in Boston, U.S.A., in September, Mr. Webster said it was significant of a new life for religion and theology, a life of spiritual freedom, earnestness, sincerity, and development. It was remarkable in its comprehensiveness. Addresses were also given by the Revs. A. Brown, C. Mackie, and others.

Ainsworth (Farewell).—A party was held on Saturday, October 26, to bid farewell to the Rev. M. R. Scott, on his removal to Southport. After tea Dr. Nuttall, of Little Lever, presided, supported by the Wardens and representatives of the various institutions connected with the chapel and Sunday-school. In an admirable speech the chairman referred to the happy eight years which they had been privileged to enjoy, and to the universal esteem and regard in which Mr. Scott was held by the whole district, while deeply regretting their loss, wished him every success in his new sphere of work. Short speeches were also given by Mr. W. H. Brooks representing the congregation, Mr. W. Sellars (for the Sunday-school), and Messrs. W. Y. Greenhalgh and J. Lord (for the teachers and scholars). The chairman then asked Mr. Peter Greenhalgh, one of the oldest members of the congregation, and Mr. R. Bolton (superintendent of the Sunday-school), to present Mr. Scott some 65 volumes of the works of Ruskin, Thoreau, Lowell, Montaigne, and other authors, as a token of their high esteem from the congregation and Sunday-school respectively. In an eloquent and deeply interesting speech, Mr. Scott acknowledged the gift, reviewing his work and connection with Ainsworth, and paying a high tribute to the congregation as a whole for their co-operation and assistance during his ministry. Mr. Scott concluded his ministry at Ainsworth next day. The old chapel was quite filled with friends from all denominations, testifying to the high esteem in which he is held in the district.

Atherton.—At the re-opening of the Guild, on Thursday evening, October 31, notwithstanding very inclement weather, upwards of sixty young people, over sixteen years of age, met Rev. J. J. Wright to inaugurate the winter's work. Various committees and officers to work the several institutions were appointed. In the study department it was agreed this season to take Longfellow's "Miles Standish," as lending itself to some instruction about religion in America. The Guild rejoiced in having a newly-furnished and well-equipped room to meet in.

Birmingham.—The National Conference Guilds Union held its autumnal meeting at the Old Meeting Church on Saturday, November 2. Representatives from the Guilds at Kidderminster, Leicester, Oldbury, and Birmingham, assembled to the number of about 100. The chair was taken by the President, Rev. F. K. Freeston, who spoke of the Guild work and the desirability of affiliation. He called attention to the different objects the Union had in view—the essay scheme and the reading circle—and emphasised the advantages of co-operation. During the afternoon and evening most interesting papers were read by the Rev. J. E. Stronge, Mr. Highfield (Kidderminster), Miss Gittins (Leicester), and Miss M. Twist (Birmingham). A vote of thanks to the Old Meeting Guild members for their hospitality was proposed by the Rev. E. A. Voysey, and a successful gathering was brought to a close.

Bolton: Halliwell-road.—A "Cake and Apron" sale, in aid of the church funds, was opened on Saturday, October 26, by Mrs. Cropper, of Eagley, and realised the satisfactory sum of £20.

Bridport (Welcome Meeting).—In connection with the settlement of the Rev. William Lyddon Tucker, M.A., as minister of East-street Chapel, a special service was held on Tuesday evening, conducted by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, of Gee Cross. A large congregation listened with deep interest to Mr. Dowson's eloquent words of advice and exhortation to minister and people. Afterwards a soiree and welcome meeting took place in the schools, which had been tastefully decorated for the occasion. Tea and coffee having been served, Mr. H. S. Suttill took the chair, and was supported on the platform by the Revs. H. Enfield Dowson, Rudolf Davis, A. Sutcliffe, R. Finnerty, Major Colfox, Messrs. J. Sutcliffe and Rendell, and Mr. and Mrs. Tucker. Letters of apology were read from the Revs. Dr. Carpenter, W. Copeland Bowie, A. N. Blatchford, and J. Dempsey (Congregationalist), regretting their inability to be present, and offering their best wishes for the future. Mr. Suttill spoke of the general regret felt at the absence of Mr. Thomas Male, senior warden, on account of ill-health, but was glad to be able to give a favourable report of his progress towards complete recovery. He moved a vote of hearty thanks to Mr. Dowson for his presence and address, which was seconded by Major Colfox and Mr. Edward Randall, and carried with acclamation. Mr. Dowson's reply was full of most interesting reminiscences of his visits to Bridport whilst still a student at Manchester College, London, from 1861-3, and of his early friendship with the late Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Colfox, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Colfox, the Messrs. Hounsell, and others, whose names are held in honoured memory. He also spoke very kindly of the work of Mr. and Mrs. Tucker during their eight years' residence in Flowery Field, Hyde. The Revs. Rudolf Davis (Bridgwater) and A. Sutcliffe (Crewkerne) joined in welcome on behalf of the ministers of the district. Mr. and Mrs. Tucker responded with sincere thanks for the cordial welcome given on all sides. Mr. Tucker said he felt deeply the honour and responsibility of being called upon to succeed such scholarly Christian gentlemen as the Revs. Russel Lant Carpenter and H. S. Solly. He asked those present for their continual sympathy and co-operation in work and worship.

Chorley.—On Wednesday, Oct. 30, and Saturday, Nov. 2, a bazaar was held in the schoolroom in order to clear a debt of £50 remaining upon the building. The efforts of the congregation and friends, the latter numbering many orthodox Nonconformists, resulted in the sum of £64. The chair was taken on the first day by Mr. William Brown, and the opener was Mr. Kellet Aston, both Congregationalists, while on Saturday Mr. J. Karfoot, also a Congregationalist, presided, and the opening ceremony was performed by Councillor James Crabtree, of Todmorden.

Dover.—The annual sale of useful clothing for the poor took place in the New Lecture Hall on Oct. 30 and 31. A good assortment of well-made garments were on view, but owing to the rough weather the attendance was not so good as usual. The surplus goods will be disposed of at the sewing meetings held each week.

Liverpool: Hope-street.—The annual congregational soiree, on Thursday evening, October 24, was an occasion not only for the welcoming of the Rev. H. D. and Mrs. Roberts, on their return from America, but for rejoicing over the beauty of the renovated church, which has been redecorated with great effect, according to the designs of Mr. Arnold Thornely. Mr. Fred Robinson presided, and expressed the feeling of the congregation in both of these matters. He proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Thornely, which was seconded by Mr. Cooper, supported by Mr. Harold Armstrong, and carried with acclamation. The Rev. H. D. Roberts then gave an address, in the course of which he referred to the coming celebration of the bi-centenary of their church, and the history he was preparing. In conclusion he said: "And now, as we begin our church-life together again, let us keep these two leading thoughts in our minds: first, that our church is, must be, a place for the continual baptism of each individual spirit—a continual bathing afresh in the life of God. Then, second, it must take its place in the great effort for social righteousness. Those are the two grand meanings of church-life. Leave either out, and we starve and atrophy. Let us take the motto over our chancel to heart: 'Glory to God in the Highest, on Earth Peace, Goodwill among Men.'"

London: Mansford Street.—The fortieth annual meeting of past and present scholars, teachers, and workers of Spicer-street and Mansford Street was held on Wednesday, November 6. A good programme of music was carried through under the direction of Mr. W. J. Clark. There was a large attendance, and a most enjoyable evening was spent.

Manchester (Service of Self-Consecration).—An interesting and significant new departure has been made by the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches. It has been the custom of the Association for many years past to hold the usual annual service and public meeting to gather up the results of the year's work, and to take note of the general position. This year it was suggested that it was even more important that a collective meeting should be held at the beginning of the winter for self-consecration and mutual encouragement. The absence of a number of men at the Boston Conference rather delayed the carrying out of the suggestion, but the gatherings were eventually held on Saturday last. In the afternoon a service was held in Cross-street Chapel, and there was an unusually large attendance. The devotions were conducted by the Rev. H. Dawtrey, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. N. Anderton. The preacher at once struck the hoped-for note. Avoiding matters of controversy, he pointed to the urgent needs of the hour, and to the Gospel remedies for the same. His earnest appeal came home to all his hearers, who realised that they were joining in a service of self-consecration to noble service, the fruits of which must be shown in their lives and in devotion to unselfish work. Tea was then served in the Lower Mosley-street schools, after which a large company assembled in the Memorial Hall for the evening meeting. The President of the Association, the Rev. C. Peach, presided, and the meeting was addressed by the chairman, Mrs. Manning, Rev. D. Agate, Rev. T. P. Spedding, and Mr. A. Dugdale. The speeches, which were all of an earnest devotional and practical tone, were interspersed with hearty singing of hymns. The benediction brought to a close a meeting which all had felt to be helpful and inspiring.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association.—The annual meetings were held on Oct. 27 and 28, at the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle, when the sermons were preached by the President of the Association, the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough. On the following day there took place the annual business meeting, a conference at which the Rev. W. Lindsay, of Sunderland, read a paper entitled "Duties and Privileges," a public tea in the schoolroom, and meeting in the church. At the latter the principal speaker was the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds, the representative of the B. and F. U. A. Addresses were also delivered by Revs. W. Lindsay, S. S. Brettell, H. Cross, and G. A. Ferguson, Mr. F. Tremain and other friends. At the meeting in the afternoon resolutions were passed on Temperance and against Vivisection, copies of which to be forwarded to the Prime Minister.

Portsmouth.—The widow of the late Rev. Thomas Timmins entertained a number of friends at the High-street school-room on Wednesday evening, October 30, her late husband's birthday, to commemorate his work in connection with the Band of Mercy movement. Addresses were given by the Rev. James Burton and Mrs. Timmins.

Southport (Welcome Meeting).—The Rev. Matthew R. Scott was welcomed on Wednesday evening, Oct. 30, as minister of the Portland-street Unitarian Church at a congregational reception held in the schoolroom, when there was a very large attendance of members and friends. Among those present were the Rev. A. J. Lauria, vicar of Emmanuel Church, Bolton, a near neighbour and friend of Mr. Scott's at Ainsworth; Dr Nuttall, of Little Lever, and Mr. Stott, secretary of the Ainsworth congregation. Mr. W. J. Warden, who presided, offered on behalf of the congregation the most cordial welcome to Mr. Scott. The Rev. A. J. Lauria said he esteemed it an honour to be there to offer his congratulations. He was sure they had made a wise choice, for Mr. Scott was one of his nearest and oldest friends. They had lived close together and worked together for the good of the people in the parish in which they lived; they had done their best to raise and purify the atmosphere of the parish for many happy years, and he testified to the affection in which Mr. Scott was held. Dr. Nuttall also spoke in terms of warm friendship of Mr. Scott, and wished him a happy and useful time at Southport. The Rev. J. E. Manning added his good wishes. He thought Mr. Scott would find there a very sympathetic people, an earnest people, and a generous people; a people who could appreciate what was being done for them. He did not see why that congregation should not take a greater, a more important position than it had done in the past, and be the centre of light. It ought to be a centre of social energy for the amelioration of the sufferings of the poor. The outlook was very bright, and they could look forward to a time of great usefulness in Southport and, he trusted, of great happiness. As a church they stood for precisely the same object as all the other churches stood for—the worship and service of God, and for the help and service of man; to bring God down to this world of man, and show that God was in their midst and with them. He could conceive no nobler mission for a church or for the leader of a church than to be able to convince men that God was in their midst. It should be the object of all the churches to spread goodness, righteousness, truth, and all that made for the good of society. It was delightful to hear Mr. Lauria speak as he had done, and if they could only come together in that spirit the Kingdom of God would be here in their midst. The Rev. J. C. Odgers and Mr. A. S. Thew having joined cordially in the welcome, Mr. Scott replied, and expressed warm gratitude for the way in which he had been received in Southport. Of those who had spoken he wished specially to thank Mr. Manning, who had done much kind service to that church during the interregnum. He wished also to thank his good friend whom he used to call the vicar. Those were good days they had had together, but it took two to make them. As soon as he entered the village the vicar was there to greet him, not as a matter of ceremony, but to show the hearty comradeship to a brother minister. There were some who did not look with pleasure on those amenities, but as he regarded every truth taught by the Church of England as essentially religious, and Mr. Lauria regarded every truth they held as religious, how could they be divided? They might look at many things from different points of view, but they made friendship and sympathy all the warmer and the closer. He also thanked Mr. Odgers, of Liverpool, and Dr. Nuttall, and the other friends from Ainsworth for their attendance. Mr. Manning struck the right note when he said the innermost meaning of the Christian Church was to make God real; to bring Him down into the world of men. Men were bound to take an interest in the city or the town or village or where they lived if they really believed that God was in it. Sometimes men got impatient because they did not see the church doing what they called practical work, but that he believed was a very narrow and near-sighted way to look at church work. He liked to think of the church not as a noisy instrument, but rather like the light, the means by which we saw and yet itself remaining unseen. He expressed the belief that their opportunity at that church was exceedingly great. He hoped they might take advantage of it. On Sunday Mr. Scott entered on his ministerial duties, preaching morning and evening to large congregations, in the morning on "Beauty in Religion and in Life," and in the evening on "God's Reasoning with Men."

Stockport.—On the return of the Rev. B. C. Constable from the International Conference at Boston, a pleasant surprise awaited him in the form of a new Geneva gown, presented to him by the ladies of the congregation. On Thursday, October 24, a Welcome Soirée was held in the schoolroom, at which he gave an interesting address on his American experiences, and exhibited about 350 picture post-cards of American views mounted on white cardboard displayed round the room. On Sunday, October 20, the anniversary of the Sunday-school was held, when the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, was the morning preacher. The Rev. H. Fisher Short, of Crews, preached in the evening. There were fairly good attendances, and the collections amounted to about £13. On Thursday, October 31, the School Dramatic Society organised a pleasant social evening in the schoolroom, consisting of songs, a dramatic sketch, dancing, and refreshments. There was quite a large attendance of young people, and the evening was much enjoyed.

Trebanos: Swansea Valley.—Some half dozen members of the congregation living at Wauncaeurgurwen, some miles away, thought it desirable to try the experiment of holding a Unitarian service there. So, on Tuesday night, the 29th ult., between thirty and forty went thither, their minister with them. They had a congregation of 500 in the public hall. The Baptists gave up a service in order to enable all who wished to attend. The Rev. J. Hathren Davies was the preacher.

Wolverhampton.—On Oct. 29 and 30 a highly successful sale of work was held in connection with All Souls' Church. On the first day the proceedings were opened by Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, President of the Midland Christian Union, Mr. F. Gaskell being in the chair. Mrs. Byng Kenrick, Mrs. Gaskell, the Rev. J. C. and Mrs. Street were also present. In the course of his remarks Mr. Gaskell said that the Unitarians of Wolverhampton desired to remove the impression that they were lodgers in the town by securing a permanent home. In addition to £100 already promised by the chairman to the Building Fund, that gentleman handed a further cheque of £100 to the minister as a contribution from his father, Mr. Holbrook Gaskell, of Liverpool. It may also be mentioned that the President of the Union has promised £100 when the first £100 has been raised. The sale of work on the second day was opened by Alderman Berrington (Church of England); Chairman, Rev. J. A. Shaw. The Revs. W. Dobson Bainbridge and W. Challenger (Methodist New Connexion), were present, and expressed their hearty goodwill. As on the first day the proceedings were marked by much enthusiasm. A sum exceeding £200 including donations was realised. It is necessary to state that this effort is part of a much more important project. The members of the congregation and the trustees, with the full approval of the Midland Christian Union, have decided to accept an offer from the Queen Victoria Nursing Institution to buy the present site and temporary buildings. A site equally well—or perhaps better—situated than the present one, and measuring 1,600 square yards, is to be conveyed to the congregation in exchange, with a substantial payment in cash, by means of which it is hoped to reach £1,000, and thus launch the larger scheme. The late Brooke Herford once said: "It is sometimes easier to do a big thing than it is to do a little one." The time has come to do a big thing in Wolverhampton.

MR. R. B. HALDANE AND "PUBLIC OPINION"

WAR OFFICE, 1st October, 1907.

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion" under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed on men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists, the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. HALDANE.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

8 November 1907

The Syndics of the Cambridge University Press, believing that many readers would be glad to have an opportunity of acquiring The Cambridge Modern History by small periodical payments, have made arrangements to supply it for a time on the instalment system.

The Cambridge Modern History is a general history of Europe and her colonies, and of America, from the Middle Ages to the present day. It was planned by the late Lord Acton, Regius Professor of Modern History; is edited by A. W. Ward, Litt.D., G. W. Prothero, Litt.D., and Stanley Leathes, M.A.; written by the most eminent historians of England, the Continent and America; and published by the Cambridge University Press.

An illustrated pamphlet has been prepared, giving an account of the origin, authorship and production of the History. This contains Lord Acton's original scheme, an important document never before published, long extracts from the work itself and particulars of the special terms on which, for a limited time, it can now be obtained. The pamphlet will be sent free of charge to any address on receipt of a postcard addressed 11, H. Department, Cambridge University Press Warehouse, Fetter-lane, London, E.C.

THE PRACTICAL TEACHING OF JESUS OF NAZARETH.

As Found in the Gospel According to Matthew.

Thirty-four Lessons compiled by ARTHUR W. FOX, M.A.

The substance of these Lessons was given to a Bible Class held in connection with the Todmorden Sunday School Union, at which representatives of six Nonconformist denominations were present. The notes were found helpful by these; hence it is the compiler's wish to help other Sunday School Teachers, as far as he can. The main purpose of this little book is to bring out the practical teaching of the Christ, so that it may have its mighty influence in the formation of the character of the taught.

JESUS OF NAZARETH.

An Historical and Critical Survey of His Life and Teaching.

By ETIENNE GIRAN, Pastor of the Old Walloon Church, Amsterdam. Translated by E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.

Unity says: "A remarkable and intensely interesting book. In a marvellously clear and graphic manner the author, through his translator, lays bare the results of the work of New Testament critical scholarship, takes his readers through simple analytical processes, enabling them to dissect the gospel records for themselves and to judge what is unhistorical and what is true. With this little volume in his hand, the intelligent reader who has also the ability to write is able to compile from the New Testament an approximately accurate account of the life and teaching of Jesus."

MANUALS OF EARLY CHRISTIAN HISTORY.

Edited by J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., D.Litt., D.D.

THE EARLY CHURCH:

Its Orders and Institutions.

By A. HERMANN THOMAS, M.A.

This little volume is a sequel to the manual entitled Christianity and the Roman Empire, by the Rev. W. Addis, M.A. (1893). Assuming the relations to the State described in that book, it endeavours to delineate in simple terms the complicated phases of the internal growth and organisation of the Church.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Martineau Memorial Buildings at the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, were opened on Thursday afternoon by Sir W. B. Bowring, Bart., of Liverpool, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in place of Sir John Brunner, who was unfortunately prevented by illness from being present. A brief service was first held in the chapel, at which a prayer of dedication was offered by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, and then, after the opening ceremony at the chief door of the new buildings, a meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, when addresses were given by the Mayor of Norwich, Miss Gertrude Martineau, and others. Mrs. Mottram announced that £200 had been received, and the collection amounted to £30. A full report of the proceedings will appear in next week's INQUIRER.

A WORD of very cordial welcome to the Rev. Eugene R. Shippen, of Dorchester, Mass., who landed in Liverpool last Saturday from the Leyland s.s. Bohemian, with Mrs. Shippen and the children. They have come to this country for a time on account of their boy's health, and we shall be delighted to have Mr. Shippen in the fellowship of our ministry. After graduating from the Harvard Divinity School in June, 1893, he came to Manchester College, and studied there during the first session in the new buildings at Oxford. Since then, from December, 1894, he has been minister of the First Parish of Dorchester, Mass., which is a suburb of Boston, and it is a grief to his people that he has felt obliged to relinquish that charge. Warm testimony was borne at his departure to the place Mr. Shippen holds in their affections and in the esteem of the whole community. Tribute was paid to his power as a preacher, his scholarship, his broad, catholic spirit, the high standard of his citizenship, his devotion to the welfare of his church and parish, and above all to his power of winning and holding affection. Mr. Shippen is looking forward in the first instance to something of the nature of a Sabbatical year in this country, but he will be glad to preach as occasion offers.

WE are publishing this week the first part of Dr. Hunter's International Sermon, preached in Arlington-street Church, Boston, Mass., at the recent Congress of Religious Liberals. Those who were present in the church will remember that the sermon took eighty minutes to deliver, and it will fill eighteen INQUIRER columns, so that it is not possible to publish the whole at once. The sermon, which is a noble and searching plea for greater depth of religious life—"De Profundis Clamavi"—is divided into three parts: (i) The Depths of Life; (ii) The Cry for God out of the Depths; (iii) The Divine Answer to the Cry. The three parts will appear from week to week in these columns.

THE many friends of Professor Upton will heartily welcome the announcement made in our columns this week by his colleagues in Manchester College. No teacher has won warmer affection from his old students than Professor Upton, and they will certainly rejoice with other friends and admirers in this opportunity of showing their regard for one of the most unselfish and modest of men.

THIS week we have "Association Sunday" (November 17), and next week "Temperance Sunday" (November 24), when the religious bearings of Temperance and Total Abstinence will be considered from many pulpits.

SIR LEWIS MORRIS, author of "Songs of Two Worlds," "The Epic of Hades," and other poems, died at Carmarthen on Tuesday morning, being seventy-four years of age. We notice that in Who's Who he is modestly described at a "Writer of Verse." A native of Carmarthen he was an ardent Welshman, and did excellent work for higher education in the Principality.

THE United Methodist Church, which must be getting used to its new name and its triune nature by this time showed itself to the world by way of a bazaar in Sheffield last week. The Master Cutler, who acted as chairman, referred to the union of the three Methodist denominations as a very important event, and said the union must be very encouraging to every broad-minded man. They were all making for one end. It was not too much to ask all professed Christian men to sink their preferences in regard to Church organisation, for the immense benefits which would accrue from union. Frankly he would like to see union carried much further. He would like to see every Protestant denomination united into one huge solid church, and, they would excuse him for saying it, he would like that church to be the Church of England!

"EXAGGERATED Independency" is the theme of the Rev. G. C. Britton in an article in the last issue of the British Congregationalist. Mr. Britton, who, by the way, has recently been installed as assistant to Mr. Silvester Horne, at Whitefield's Central Mission, has some terse and practical things to say on the subject. He sees significance in the use of the expression in a paper with which is incorporated the Independent. The term has had its day, and must go. Independence is too near of kin to isolation and indifference. "As soon as you admit any kind of union or interaction or co-operation, you must destroy the independent character. The fact is that in all useful work in the world, and especially in distinctly Christian work, there is no independence. Independency is admittedly not a good thing." Mr. Britton is quite willing to dismiss Independency, and in its place to have a strong Congregationalism, a linking up of strong and weak churches in their several districts and towns in a comprehensive Congregational Church. He recognises that such a change would necessitate sacrifices, but he believes most of the ministers would welcome it, and that deacons and congregations might be educated to it.

Is restatement of doctrine denial? Obviously not necessarily so. Yet, as obviously, some restatement is denial. By delicate gradations the one may pass into the other, though to determine the precise point at which it does so may require no inconsiderable skill and judgment. Much also depends on the mental habits of the judge. He who, in restating the doctrines of the Atonement and Resurrection, shall repudiate the substitutional view of the one and the physical view of the other, shall be deemed by many who hold these views to have denied the doctrines altogether. For to them, it is their view or none. This distinction is peculiarly interesting at the present moment in view of the action of the governors of Montreal Methodist Theological College, who have called for the resignation of Professor Workman, on the ground that he has denied the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. And Dr. Workman's defence is, "I have not denied any essential doctrine of the Church, nor repudiated any fundamental principle, but have simply tried to give a re-statement of certain doctrines in accordance with the critical interpretation of the New Testament." But, whether justified by the facts or not, a majority of those who sat in judgment on Dr. Workman has decided that his re-statements have carried him over from the sphere of affirmation into that of denial.

It would be doubtfully fair in any sectarian controversy to quote the confessions of a church against itself, or to wound it with the rebukes of its own leading men. But for the purpose of this paragraph, it is lawful to cite the statement of the Rev. E. Lloyd Jones that in Liverpool "the net result of twenty years' work, with an increased ministry and a larger number of churches, was that there were not more than fifty-nine persons in the Wesleyan Methodist churches of Liverpool to-day to one hundred twenty years ago." And that in Manchester, within living memory, "there were more people in Oxford-road Chapel on any given Sunday morning than are to be found in the whole of the Oxford-road circuit on any Sunday morning to-day." As every reader of this paper will know, the lament is quoted in a spirit of sympathy. We have had repeatedly to deplore a similar lack of success. When Mr. Jones says that "the permanent cause is that the natural mind is enmity against God," he uses language, scriptural though it be, which somewhat repels us. Yet if ever we have admitted that, the element of selfish fear being eliminated from men's minds, they become less eager to know God's will, less forward to do it, less disposed to confer with themselves, and with one another about it, we have by implication admitted a state of things much like that alleged by Mr. Jones. The conclusion, after all, need not be disheartening. The "permanent" evil is not eternal. When a group of people are found who trust God and do not hold aloof from Him, who manifestly take delight in learning and doing God's will, even now they attract others to join them. The mere appearance of devotion and heavenly joy, though transient and superficial, has often a temporary effect for good. Deep and heartfelt religion tends to arouse men to repentance as the dawn tends to awaken the sleeper. If we could obey the prophet's admonition to arise and shine, men would begin to awake and wonder that they had overslept.

THE Committee of the London Centre of the Methodist Union for Social Service passed a resolution the other day as follows:—

"The committee, in view of the demoralising tendencies manifested in the Press, expresses its sympathy with all journalists and newspaper proprietors who are trying to maintain the high tradition of English journalism, and are co-operating in mitigating the evil. It urges Churches to exert the utmost influence to discourage journals which have left, or are leaving, those honourable traditions, and it protests against newspapers and magazines prompting circulation by competitions which are in the nature of a lottery. It further appeals to the police authorities to take action in repressing papers of obviously immoral tendencies, and recommends all who value the purity of the young to be more vigilant in preventing and protesting against the evil, and in arousing public opinion on the subject."

As far as it goes the resolution is timely and sensible. Meantime there are one or two kindred evils that might make matter for supplementary resolutions. Why do avowedly Christian papers by advertisements sometimes broad and sprawling, at other times sneakily small and hypocritical, encourage ignorant people to spend their money on quack pills and syrups? Why encourage methods of trading that are manifestly demoralising, as when foolish and short-sighted people are invited to avail themselves of an offer of many pounds' worth of goods by paying two and sixpence down? Christian admonition to be good is nullified by these emphatic invitations to practical folly.

THE "Baynton" who contributes to the current number of the Hibbert Journal a discussion of the ideal of Mr. Lloyd Thomas's "Free Catholic Church," is our friend the Rev. R. W. Boynton, of St. Paul, Minnesota, who represented the American Unitarian Association at our anniversary meetings last Whitsuntide. Mr. Boynton stands up for the virtues of a strenuous Protestantism, and distinguishes between Catholicism, which he distrusts, and Catholicity, which he welcomes, as "an inner grace of appreciation that can belong only to a free spirit."

MR. A. C. BENSON's contribution "At Large" to Cornhill this month is on "Travel." It is as usual a charming essay. "As I grow older," says Mr. Benson, "I tend to travel less and less, and I do not care if I never cross the Channel again." One reason is that there is so much that is beautiful at home—things perfectly beautiful close at hand. Then people so often travel to be kept from thinking, and that is not what Mr. Benson wants. "I am quite as much at a loss as anyone else to say what is the object of life, but I do not feel any doubt that we are not sent into the world to be in a fuss. Like the lobster in The Water-Babies, I cry, 'Let me alone; I want to think!' because I believe that that occupation is at least as profitable as many others."

"NOTHING, it is true," says Mr. Benson, at the conclusion of his essay, "can give us peace; but we get nearer it by loving the familiar scene, the old homestead, the tiny valley, the wayside copse, than we do by racing over Europe on the track of Giorgione, or over Asia in pursuit of local colour. After all, everything has its appointed time. It is good to range in youth, to rub elbows with humanity, and then, as the days go on, to take stock, to remember, to wonder, 'To be content with little, to serve beauty well.'"

WE are informed that in consequence of the arrangements made for the visit of the Rev. Joseph Wood to Stratford this Saturday evening, the "At Home" to be given by the Laymen's and Women's Social Clubs has been postponed until Saturday, January 25 next.

WORKERS' AID SOCIETY.—The secretary begs to remind members that their contributions are due at the end of the present month or very early in December. She has the pleasure of thanking the members of the society for their constant and generous help, and for the good quality and usefulness of their contributions. The Workers' Aid Society was founded in 1891. Its object is to help to provide suitable clothing for the little children in the Winifred House Nursing Home, and its members are required to contribute two garments and a subscription of sixpence yearly. A second object of the society is to send any garments not quite suitable for invalid children to the various London missions in poor districts, which object, during the late hard winters, has become increasingly popular with the members. The sixpenny subscription being more than is needed for the expenses, has helped to provide more garments for this latter purpose. Although in the sixteen years of the society's existence new members have always stepped into the places left vacant from various causes, the membership itself has increased very little, and it has been suggested that a short account of the work of the society might lead others to join it. In the second year the number of members was 32. Since that time it has occasionally risen above 40, and it is now 37. It would be a great pleasure to double that number. The object is a good one, the effort required is not very great, and the contributors may have the pleasant consciousness that their gifts are well applied and much needed, and that they are really aiding the workers in their arduous and devoted work. Any further information will be gladly supplied by Mrs. Goodwyn Barmby, Mount Pleasant, Sidmouth.

To put the intellectual danger of mysticism into the language of philosophy, we shall have to say that the danger is lest the distinction between subject and object should be lost. The union of man with God must be like a marriage. The more perfect the union of will and feeling between man and woman in marriage, the more perfect is the marriage. But the very essence of marriage consists in the separate personalities of the two thus joined together. It is the sense of union, not with self, but with another than self, that constitutes all the beauty and solemnity of marriage. And in like manner it is the sense of union with Another, even with God, always other than self, however self be penetrated by God, that constitutes all the truth and holiness of religion.

R. A. Armstrong,

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

PUBLIC MEETING IN BIRMINGHAM.

WHEN it was decided by the Trustees of Manchester College last January to hold in future only one annual business meeting (instead of two as heretofore), and to hold it in June, at Oxford, it was urged that another new departure also should be made and that every year a public meeting on behalf of the College should be held in some great centre of population, that so renewed interest in the work and the ideals of the college might be wakened in all parts of the country in succession. Birmingham, as the centre of the Midlands, and the home of the President, was chosen for the first of these meetings, and on Thursday evening, November 7, the meeting was held, in the Temperance Hall, Temple-street.

The President, the Right Hon. WILLIAM KENRICK, took the chair, and was supported by Principal Carpenter, Professor Jacks, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, Chairman of the College Committee, and the Rev. Joseph Wood. The treasurer, Mr. Charles W. Jones, was also to have been present, but was prevented by indisposition. The churches of the district were well represented in the audience of about three hundred.

THE PRESIDENT, in opening the proceedings said they had been sorry to hear from Mr. Charles Jones that he was unable to be present. The object of that meeting was to make the claims of the College on all free and non-subscribing churches better known and appreciated, and to gain the support of all who desired to aid in the spread of religious truth. It could not be said that Birmingham, up to the present time, had taken its share in the work in any way commensurate with its population and importance, and with what, he ventured to think, was the intelligence and public spirit of the inhabitants. Referring to the list of subscribers in the last annual report, he found that apart from London, there were five cities and towns which headed the list. Manchester with 50 subscribers, contributed £108 8s.; Liverpool, with 41 subscribers, £187 2s.; Leeds, with 26 subscribers, £58 19s. 6d.; Bolton, with 18 subscribers, £34 17s.; and Birmingham, with 15 subscribers, £33 12s. Thus Birmingham, was fifth on the list, but ought, in his opinion, at least to be third. He quoted figures to show how urgent was the need for more support, there being an annual deficiency of some £500, and the inevitable steady loss through death of annual subscribers. Urging the claim of the College on their support, the President quoted from the last annual address of the committee, an expression of their desire, in connection with the appointment of Professor Henry Jones, "that the College should be recognised by earnest minds as a place where the best and highest thought is engaged in dealing with the ultimate problems of religion in a free and reverent spirit"; and this concluding passage of the address:—"They see a desire for freedom of thought growing in most of the Christian churches. They see a growing dislike of denominational names, and creeds and barriers in many religious teachers and thinkers. They see the principles of Manchester College, consciously or unconsciously, accepted by men who, while they may be divided in opinion, are united in spirit. It is with a great hope that they see the larger liberal movement in Christian thought to-day. They feel that Manchester College by its complete freedom, by its love of veracity, by its reverence for whatever is good and true in all the creeds, has an ever-increasing opportunity of doing work on behalf of truth and unity in religion."

Belief which was formulated in the articles of a creed, the President said in conclusion, must become, sooner or later, a dead belief. A living belief must grow and expand untrammelled by creed. That was recognised by their non-subscribing churches, and it was the very foundation of Manchester College.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, referring to the reasons which had led to the holding of that meeting, spoke with warm affection of Birmingham, and of the president, who bore a name highly honoured in that college. He spoke with enthusiasm of his Alma Mater, of the principle of non-subscription, the unpledged spirit and the holy quest for truth, by which their churches also had been inspired. They were glad of the freer movement of the "New Theology" in other churches, and hoped it would prosper, but that was no reason why they should now sing a Nunc dimittis. If their cause was now about to triumph, they must be in at the triumph. They gained a new confidence through the work Mr. Jacks was doing, in the Hibbert Journal, one of the finest works a minister could undertake. It was a great day in which they lived, and if the promised land was opening before them, their feet must not be the last to enter in. His prayer was that Manchester College, in the coming time, might be the home of culture and the shrine of liberty, as it had been in the past, and so be a model to all the churches.

The Rev. L. P. JACKS, speaking of the ideals of the ministry, said there were certain essentials on which he should not dwell, because no one was likely to overlook them. He need not argue that the ideal minister must be a religious and a good man; but there were other aspects of the ideal more likely to be forgotten. The ideal minister was one who had an intelligent understanding of the deepest needs of the age in which he lived, and profound sympathy with those needs. The ideal minister was simply a Christian gentleman. He defined it in that way, because that was the ideal for every man, and the minister could not make a greater mistake than to assume to himself any kind of professional character, which he could not share with all men and women. The ministry which should win back the respect of mankind in the present day must be based not on the professional ideal, but the human. When he spoke of the Christian gentleman he used the term, not in any corrupt sense, but as it might be used of any man, whether born in a cottage or a palace. He was one who was keenly alive to all the needs of those about him, and regarded it as his highest duty and greatest pleasure to help others in satisfying those needs. He was one who, by thinking of the needs of others and doing his best to satisfy them, had learnt the art of forgetting himself. And there was no occupation so well fitted to the character of the gentleman as that of the ministry. That was the ideal occupation for him. In no other calling could so much be learnt of the needs of others. In no other calling would they find so many opportunities of satisfying the needs of others, or find it so easy to acquire the art of forgetting themselves through devotion to the interests of their neighbours. The gentleman was wanted everywhere, but nowhere so much as in the ministry. The working classes, it was said, liked a gentleman. So they did, but with a very fastidious taste. They knew the real sort from the spurious. Proceeding to ask what a theological college could do towards realising that ideal, in the furnishing of Christian gentlemen for the ministry, Mr. Jacks pointed out that the churches must first furnish the material. The way to make a Christian gentleman, he added, was to treat him as one, and that was how they tried to treat their students at Manchester College. It was not treating a man as a gentleman, to try and force your opinions down his throat, or to penalise him if he refused to accept your opinions. In ordinary life that was recognised as a breach of good manners, but there had been curiously little recognition of it in the realm of theology. What they aimed at in Manchester College was to bring before their students the widest possible range of facts, and then to leave them to form their own opinions, and respect them when formed. They were happy in the effort to impart knowledge. They did not neglect the old traditional subjects, but no longer laid exclusive emphasis on the Bible. They went beyond the Bible for the range of studies proper for an ideal minister; they took the great subject of human character, the principles on which human character was based, and those deeper truths of philosophy on which they rested in their turn. Nor did they confine their attention to the character of the individual man, but studied human society. Manchester College, he believed, was ahead of all other theological colleges in the country, in the thorough manner in which the study of sociology, the nature and structure of human society, was carried out, and that it was so was largely owing to the efforts of Principal Carpenter. They were making an honest attempt to turn out Christian gentlemen, to send them forth to the work of the ministry, but the possibility of their success must depend on their having the right material. Send us some of your raw gold, he said in conclusion, and give us the chance of showing what we can do.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, who followed, said that the supply of students for the ministry, their maintenance and education, was very much a layman's question. They had a very high ideal of the qualities they wanted in a minister; but if that was so they must take the proper means for getting what they wanted. It came very largely by training, by education, and noble influences at college. They must provide adequately for the training and the maintenance of the students at College. Preaching power was the great thing wanted in their churches, and the power of the pulpit nowadays must depend on the force of the man in it. They must get the right kind of man and then train him for the work. Bishop

Gore had recently said that the Church in future would have to draw more and more from the artisan and cottage class for its ministry, and there was advantage in that, for such men would best understand the needs of the people. So it was with them also, Mr. Wood added. Among the working classes there was plenty of moral enthusiasm, but it must be trained. The very rise and strength of the Socialist movement was a tribute to the moral feeling in the hearts of a great many people. They could turn that moral feeling into a religious channel if they only went about it in the right way. They could get the men, he believed; but they would have to be maintained, as well as trained, at College.

The Rev. Dr. CARPENTER gave the last address, and having told of the cordial reception given to the college on its opening at Oxford, fourteen years ago by a distinguished group of academic teachers, as proof of the breaking down of the old division between Anglican and Nonconformist, proceeded to speak of the nature of their studies at Manchester College. The growth of knowledge in theology, as in other subjects, had led to a great extension of the need for specialised teaching. It was no longer possible for one or two men to be masters of the field of knowledge needed for the equipment of the minister. For the right understanding of the Bible itself, there was need of the freest interpretation, the widest knowledge and the most careful criticism; and so with philosophy, and with the history of the church, and the history of religion, which were all related to one another and far beyond the power of any single mind to master or to teach. The college required a group of teachers for the several branches; and so with social ethics, applied to modern needs, and the relation of the ministry to these.

By planting the college at Oxford they had given a kind of challenge to the University, and they must have as full an equipment as possible. It was the sole representative there of the principle that liberty was the only basis for the scientific study of theology. Oxford accepted that principle in other fields; but when would its doors be open in the same way to free theological teaching? As a welcome sign of progress in that direction he mentioned the fact that in the programme of the Summer Extension meetings the unofficial theological lectures at Manchester College were announced equally with the lectures of the Dean of Christ Church; and at those lectures they had had large attendances. That was one example of the way in which at Oxford they had opportunities of teaching which extended their influence far beyond the little group of their own students; and of their own students he found, on comparing the lists, that they had fifty per cent. more in the college at Oxford than in an equal period immediately before the removal. You have planted us, said Dr. Carpenter, in the face of the University, given us a most beautiful building, an extremely valuable library (but with extraordinary gaps), and a chapel;—one of the most precious influences of the college; but it has all to be maintained. As to the financial maintenance of the students, that, he said, was a very serious burden, which no college ought to have to bear. They needed a different kind of organisation to bring up the students; the right course, he held, was for the churches, through their National Conference, to establish a College Board which should be charged with the care of students for the ministry. On the future maintenance of the college at Oxford there depended something more than the welfare of the group of churches with which they were intimately connected, the hope of the gradual widening of theological co-operation, and the recognition, which the future was certain to bring, that however the old theologies might crumble, and the institutions of the Church be modified, religion was a permanent possession of the human heart, and could never be taken out of their lives.

The PRESIDENT, in bringing the meeting to a close, moved a vote of thanks to the speakers, which was carried by acclamation. This was acknowledged by Mr. Dowson, who made one more appeal, with humour, earnestness, and good hope, for a larger measure of support.

THE BEST OF THE NEW THEOLOGY.*

THE clearest head and the most human outlook among the New Theology writers have combined to give us, in these Bradford addresses, all that is most vital and permanent in the movement. It would have been pleasant, and more than pleasant, to be one of the increasing crowd that listened to them—the manner is so direct, the treatment is (for the purpose) so sufficient and full, and there is the apt and forceful way of putting before untrained minds just the essentials of the controversy, which are as fateful and momentous to them as to others. The simple call it simplicity. If our Association wanted a new pamphlet they could scarcely do better than take this one and scatter it broadcast. The dangerous pitfalls of the New Theology road are, for the most part, fairly well avoided. "Immanence" has not engulfed Mr. Williams' Theism. "We are of Him, but we are not He. The identity of God and man is a contradiction in terms; the oneness of God and man is a necessity of life. [Italics ours.] If God were not other than man He could not be God to man. Yet if God were not in man, man could never grow Godlike, and religion would be impossible." Mr. Williams' presentation of this subject will do much to counteract the exaggerated stress laid upon Immanence—natural enough to men anxious to come to terms with Science, but harmful in the long run to properly religious considerations. Perhaps Mr. Williams himself scarcely realises how little of novelty there is in the Immanence idea. It certainly is novel as set against prevalent notions of the early nineteenth and the eighteenth centuries. But all religious men, when not absorbed in mere theory, have cherished the kernel of the Immanence truth, for the teaching of God's near presence in the world meant this, whether in the storm and earthquake, or in the life of moral societies, or in holy places. The attack of the prophets upon idolatry may be regarded as an ancient reaction from Immanence to Transcendence. "Have ye not heard? To whom will ye liken God? A graven image? Lift up your eyes on high and see who hath created these. There is no searching of his understanding." Paul's address to the Athenians, again, is a strong blending of the two aspects of the one truth. "He dwelleth not in temples made with hands; yet he is not far from each one of us, for in him we live." Mr. Inge, in his Paddock Lectures, has tried to show that "the doctrine of the Divine Immanence in the human heart never became quite the central truth of theology till the time of the mediæval mystics," and quotes the elder Eckhart: "God is nigh unto us but we are far from Him; God is within, we are without," &c. But this can be paralleled in all ages. Even Miracle was a more or less clumsy way of bringing out the same thing; and it is curious to observe that, whereas the whole trend of the New Theology is supposed to be away from the miraculous because of its Immanence teaching, it often uses the Immanence idea to support a view about Jesus which is nothing but the miraculous revived (God being so much immanent in Jesus that Jesus can be put apart and called God). But there is no confusion of that kind in Mr. Williams' work. His treatment of the Virgin Birth is a model of rapid, convincing exposition. Another example of the same art is the address on "The Character of Jesus: Was he Sinless?" In his chapter on "The Authority of Jesus" we could wish that Mr. Williams had gone a little deeper. He begins by disposing of the ordinary notions of an external authority, in a trenchant manner that leaves nothing to be desired. If the authority of Jesus is to be maintained as external in its nature, then an examination of the gospels shows how fragmentary, how conflicting, of what very different values are the "authoritative" records. And if we accept certain sayings of Jesus as securely authentic, the larger number of questions on which a modern man desires guidance do not even faintly enter within the horizon of the Master's interests. If, then, authority is really within ourselves and moral, the question arises, Is every man to be his own authority? The answer is, "No man is a mere individual; the content of his individuality is a social content; he is rooted in society and in history. He must think for himself, but he cannot think at all without the help of others. . . . So far from the man being his own authority, he feels that he is only one interpreter of an authority which is much greater than any individual property. He gets to feel that he is greater than he can comprehend. . . . This is the experience that has led men to believe in God, and it is this same experience that has brought them into societies that they might help one another to know him. . . . The richest personalities are the greatest helpers. . . . Like us, yet above us—that is the condition of mastery." Never was so lucid a statement of a great crux in theology and social philosophy. What the whole tradition of Benthamism, with its allied schools, was dead to, what the Idealisms of the Chair have been striving to formulate for a century, is here baked into common bread! Yet it seems to us to be capable of still further application. On the question how can the influence of Jesus be so potent and so necessary to us, Mr. Williams sets us well on the right road; but on the question what is his influence, there is a want of fulness and definiteness in the statement. There is too much of the tendency to explain the influence of Jesus (following Professor Peabody's article) as that of a "strong man," a "magnetic personality," the kind of remarkable person who might head a chapter of "The World's Striking Figures," and whom a romanticist poet might take for a subject. After Romanticism generally comes Decadence. Mr. Williams regards the exalted estimation in which Jesus came to be held after his death, as the result of "a process of idealisation." And he justifies and rejoices in the fact. "It is only through idealisation, after all, that you get at the deeper fact. You cannot do justice to historical worth until you recognise its symbolical worth; you cannot do justice to a good character until you have idealised it." So the Christ-Ideal sprang up. This Christ-Ideal "has shown its capacity to widen with life, to stand for more and more. Every enrichment of life becomes a further enrichment of the Christ-Ideal which keeps ever ahead of us, urging us on." Assuredly we can have no quarrel with what Mr. Williams means here. It is only the word "idealisation" that does not run quite smoothly. Mr. Williams believes that the "ideal" did actually reproduce and symbolise "the main qualities of the historical Jesus"; so that no mere imaginative figment is intended. Still, what we are in need of, and what the New Theology men do not give us, is a new picture and a new interpretation of Jesus: a view of him that shall not merely accompany, but shall be the unique and proper result of whatever clearer spiritual perceptions the New Theology may have brought into the world. We want, that is, a truer religious view of Jesus, not only a truer sociological explanation of him. We want to know how he saves men; for he does. Men need an Ideal; but they need other things.

This brings us to the deepest issue of the movement. Mr. Williams loyally supports his comrades when they say that "Sin is selfishness"—even "only selfishness" (p. 27). It is true that he does his best to take off the awkward implications of this crudity. But the statement is to stand. We can see that it is necessitated by the idea that individuals form part of a great Whole. "Living for the self at the expense of the whole," in Mr. Campbell's words, is sin. Now, it is true that sin is always selfish. But this does not justify us in defining sin as selfishness. Sin is always un-useful, but the Utilitarians were not therefore justified in defining sin as disutility. There is a deeper depth in this matter. Sin is against God. You cannot feel selfish towards God. You cannot wrong or injure God. You can only wrong or injure and be selfish towards your fellows. Sin always does entail the breach of our social relationships, but it involves more than this. And, if we think not of the social whole but of the cosmic whole, it is obvious that we do not feel selfish towards it. Mr. Inge quotes from the Stoics that a selfish man is a cancer in the universe. But on the theory we are considering a selfish man is as much an organic part of the universe as a loving man, for sin is regarded as a necessary stage of our progress. It is plain, then, that this notion of whole and part, and sin as selfishness, explains nothing. Sin is a breach of a quite special personal obligation; it is disobedience to God, not merely injury to men. The New Theologians, in fact, have missed the point of the modern difficulty in this matter. Tired of the morbid emphasis laid upon the "sense of sin," they reply, "The higher man is not now worrying about his sins," and they devolve upon a merely sociological view, and lose altogether the religious view, of sin. The modern point to be seized is not that men have lost the sense of sin, but they have lost what the sense of sin did successfully conserve for a former time, the sense of personal obligation, of direct moral relationship, to God. Mr. Wicksteed, in his Leicester Conference address, rather seems to assume that they have not lost this. But the New Theology movement comes as a symptom showing the contrary, and as a defence of it; for it does not keep clear the distinction, which Mr. Wicksteed maintains, between religious and social relations. And just for that reason it cannot return upon our social relations and show their deeper significance, their religious implications—the vision of God which they mediate for us; the invisible Church they prefigure; in fact, the whole power of "atonement" and solidary Redemption from Sin, implicit in humanity and gathered up in Christ.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

The Contemporary this month has two articles of very special interest. To the first of these, Mr. Addis's article on "The Pope's Encyclical and the Crisis in the Roman Church," we have already briefly referred. Having spoken of the liberal Catholic movement, and especially of M. Loisy and Father Tyrrell, Mr. Addis concludes that for the Roman Church the proud boast semper eadem is for the present gone, and the semblance of unity has vanished also." The Pope, indeed, thinks to crush out all error by the weight of his authority, but the Pope, says Mr. Addis in conclusion, "forgets that he is not in the Middle Ages, that the wounds of criticism must be healed by criticism, that error cannot be refuted by denunciation and espionage. He has done his best to make Romanism an impossible creed for educated men. He may succeed in expelling 'modernists' from the Church, though they are spread in many lands, represent the utmost variety of interests, philosophic, critical, and social, and possess learning, ability, and personal influence in a church which has none of these precious qualities to spare. The Popes have won such victories in the past, but they have been Pyrrhic victories. They drove out Luther and lost the allegiance of the most progressive nations in Europe. They crushed Jansenism, and the result may be seen in the France of the Revolution and the France of to-day. The Church of England has faults of her own. But she has not proclaimed war against knowledge; she has not lost faith in candour, and truth, and justice."

The other article to which we refer is the first part of a vigorous polemic on "Idealism and Politics" by Professor Henry Jones, The crucial matter, in which Professor Jones, replying to Mr. Hobhouse, proposes to deal with the charges brought against the idealist philosophy as being socially retrograde and fatal to a sound morality, will come in the second part; but in this first article there is a refreshing defence of the English people from the indictment of Mr. Hobhouse's little book on "Democracy and Reaction." That book, says Professor Jones, contains a picture of this nation drawn by passion, a passionate indignation kindled at the time of the South African war. He himself evidently shared that passion, for he says: "Those events have left a stain upon the national honour and nothing can quite remove it; not even the unexampled magnanimity shown by British statesmanship in restoring freedom to the conquered people. The blatant imperialism and reckless greed which helped to bring about the conflict and the sane and far-sighted imperialism which, so far as possible, has removed its evil effects, will stand upon the pages of our history in a contrast which nothing can mitigate." But both must be taken into account in any judgment of our people, and Professor Jones's criticism is that Mr. Hobhouse has played too exclusively the part of the denunciatory prophet, blind to the more hopeful signs in the nation's life. "Beneath, beyond, all around the frothy foam of moral scepticism and intellectual sophistry there are the deep waters of the wide, swinging ocean making eternal music beneath the stars. England is not sceptic. England is not indifferent to the issues of right and wrong. Our country is not hardened to all pity, nor is it deaf to the cries of the wronged and oppressed, whether within or without its gates. . . Can it be that our modern prophet has dwelt too long amongst the politicians, the journalists, and the financiers, and mistaken the green-room for the stage on which is veritably acted the great drama of our national life."

The article in the Albany Review to which we would draw special attention is that on "Peace and War" by Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson. He examines the chief arguments in favour of war, as ultimately a benefit to the race, and shows how fallacious they are, and effectually disposes of the pretence that war is inevitable in the life of nations, by a kind of law of Nature. "If we do not know the 'laws' of history, we can at least observe that its process has involved, so far as our knowledge extends, a gradual enlargement of the areas within which peace is maintained, and a gradual substitution of judicial for military methods. The development which has led to the disappearance of the blood feud and the duel, and to the substitution of a few great empires for a larger number of warring communities may, quite conceivably, end in the creation, first in the west, and ultimately throughout the world, of a federal unity. . . . If anyone wants soberly to interpret history, he can at least as plausibly interpret it in the sense of peace, as in the sense of war."

The Nineteenth Century and After has an article on "The Portent of Yarmouth" by Mr. G. W. E. Russell, the portent being that at the recent Church Congress the Bishop of Norwich brought forward the subject of disestablishment as matter for serious consideration, within the sphere of practical politics. There is also an interesting article by Mr. H. W. Horwill on "The Anglican Church in America." The Bishop of Hereford writes on "An Experiment in Rural Libraries for School and Home"; and Miss Edith Sellers makes one of her interesting contributions on "Foreign Remedies for English Poor Law Defects." She pleads strongly, among other things, for discrimination among the aged poor.

LIFE AND ORGANISATION.

SIR,—May I voice the feeling of some amongst us who are pulled in two opposite directions by Mr. Wood's paper on "Organisation," and Mr. Charlesworth's letter in your issue of November 9? When Mr. Charlesworth argues that organisation is the outcome of life but that there is not among us life to organise, it would seem to be a sufficient answer to point to Mr. Wood and many others, in whom "life" has been urgently calling out, these many years, in unmistakable tones, for organisation. We remember how at Liverpool, in 1903, the whole Conference rose to Mr. Wood's declaration that "Our very discontent is a sign of life. . . . A dead church does not cry out for fuller life any more than a corpse." The maxim "Only look after the 'life' and the organisation will take care of itself," is just the most useless kind of laissez faire brought back again. May it not be, indeed is it not generally the case, that the very attempt to organise is just the most splendid manifestation of the desiderated "life"? On the other hand, there is this much of force in Mr. Charlesworth's contention, that the hoped-for organisation ought to be the expression of the deepest life in our churches, and not merely a more efficient manipulation of our associations and funds, or a more business-like method of co-operating in the routine of our work. Mr. Wood has eloquently stated the case for combination. But, really, this is not the case that needs to be argued. We are all collectivists nowadays, and even the Tory party, as the Saturday Review said last week, cannot afford to be individualist. People are rather disposed to ask, "What further kind of combination is it that you propose as an extension of the combination that already exists among us? What is to be the principle of it? Mr. Wood's fiery and moving evangel of combination is plainly concerned with something far profounder than business re-arrangements or a representative scheme. It is this we want to hear about, to set us all crying aloud for his ideal; we want his interpretation of that "life" which calls for organisation. Now Mr. Charlesworth has given us one interpretation of it as it might be, and I think he has got hold of the gist of the matter, but he expresses it in certain terms which, it seems to me, are inadequate to the fullness of his own conception. With him it is the democratic principle; and a man must be very dull, both in heart and head, who cannot see the religious implications and the spiritual beauty of that principle. As Mr. Lloyd Thomas so forcibly set forth in his letter of October 26, there is no need to commit the Church to Socialism in the party sense, and yet we can recognise the vast moral issues that are involved in the present state of politics, and throw all our weight on the right side in that struggle in which the Church and Socialism are, in different ways respectively, fighting for the same end. Still, the social question is not the whole of the religious question. There are larger interests at stake than those of material social progress. And while we agree with Mr. Charlesworth that organisation is not worth troubling about unless it is the outcome of a great religious development of man's nature, we think that our community has it within its latent spiritual energies to voice, not a partial need, but the deepest insight of our time. Now the deepest need of our time is a Church. The Church ideal is too noble and entrancing to be relinquished to the obscurantists. Shall we not set about developing our denomination into a Church? Our community ought to aim at being in little an image of what it thinks the whole Church of Christ should be. We want an organised expression of our religious life even more than we want more business-like methods of denominational work. We want an embodied ideal to which we can give ourselves with loving surrender and childlike trust and unquestioning obedience. We want a mass of men and women organised into a distinct body for fulfilling the thoughts of Christ and perpetuating his communion with God. What details of wise visitations (Mr. Wood's visits have set the example), of tender remonstrance, of stimulating "combinations," of merged prayers and submerged dogmatisms, does all this suggest. As a Socialist I am convinced that Socialism's battle is, in principle, already won. But this other is the ideal that future men will care for.

ASSOCIATION SUNDAY.

SIR,—As the recently appointed treasurer, may I be allowed the courtesy of your columns to direct the attention of your readers to the collections on behalf of the Association which will be made in a large number of churches on Sunday next, November 17? The Annual Sunday Collections give the members of our churches an opportunity of rendering aid in carrying on the missionary work of the Association.

The work which the Association is now doing is large and varied, and opportunities for additional work are constantly presenting themselves, especially in connection with the Van Mission movement. The executive committee are very grateful for the generous support of subscribers, whose number they hope will soon be largely increased. If Unitarians residing at a distance from any church, whose names are not already on the list of subscribers, will send their subscriptions to me at Essex Hall, I shall be pleased to acknowledge them, and to add them to the sum required to secure the anonymous subscription of £1,000 for the present year.

MR. VAUGHANS' CRITICISMS.

SIR,—Your report of the annual meeting of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association contains "a short summary" of a paper on "Our Opportunity" by the Rev. F. Heming Vaughan. I do not know how far the summary adequately and accurately represents Mr. Vaughan's position, which we are told was supported in the following discussion "with striking unanimity." But the report, as given, seems to me seriously misleading and unjust to our two principal organisations.

(1) Mr. Vaughan is reported to have said "Our official report fills one with dismay. The executive committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in this time of sheer indifference to any organised religion, talk about 'the need of protesting against theological doctrines which have not ceased to affect the minds and hearts of men.'" There is room, no doubt, for a difference of opinion as to the relative need and importance of "protest" against doctrines from which we dissent. A good many of those who have taken part in the Van Mission work (which, by the way, is carried on by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association), have been surprised to find how much still remains to be done in the way of clearing the ground before the more important work of religious re-construction can go forward. But be this as it may, I find it difficult to imagine how anyone, who has made himself acquainted with the work of the Association at home and abroad, with its financial and other help to more than 80 of our congregations, with the lectures and visits specially intended to foster definite religious life which it provides, with the literature which it publishes and distributes, can, on the ground alleged, feel "dismay" at its report. Anyone so afflicted might well be referred to acknowledgments of positive help which are frequently being received even from "Orthodox" ministers.

(2) Mr. Vaughan (or his summariser) then proceeds, "Our National Conference offers no better help. They apparently (vide reply to Boston International Congress letter) stand for nothing and rejoice 'in the spontaneous development of religious thought and life!'" The suggestion seems to be that the Conference sits with folded hands, complacently trusting that all will go well without any trouble on its part. If so, one might well ask, why join Association, Conference, or even congregation? But now, what was the occasion of the letter of which use is made in the above quotation. In anticipation of the recent meetings in Boston of the International Council, its committee applied to the National Conference to contribute to a collection of "creeds, confessions, declarations of belief, &c.," which it had been instructed to prepare. It was in answer to this request that the reply was sent, as a mere matter of information asked for, that "our National Conference which consists of about 350 churches, has no creed, confession, declaration of belief, or obligatory ceremony of any kind, and particularly rejoices in its freedom from such fetters on the spontaneous development of religious thought and life." Is the truth of that statement denied? If not, what is the ground of complaint?

Mr. Vaughan (or his summariser) makes much play with the word "spontaneous." Well, it is not worth while to haggle over a word; but, taken in its context, and in antithesis to the regulating and restrictive action of creeds, "Spontaneous development of religious thought and life" does seem to me, at least, to express the desire and the aim of those who are free to seek, and to love truth, and truth alone.

A PROTEST.

SIR,—I for one must protest against the language used by Mr. Page Hopps in the concluding sentence of his address at the Euston Theatre, as reported in your issue of last week. The words will be felt by many to be an outrage upon decency, to say nothing of charity. Whatever the doctrine of the Mass may be to Mr. Hopps, it is to countless thousands who hold it, as dear as life itself. Surely the attempt to turn it into ridicule is a method of warfare that in these days can only be described as "barbarous"!

PRESENTATION PORTRAIT TO PROFESSOR UPTON.

SIR,—In token of our unbounded esteem for Professor Upton, and in recognition of his great services to Manchester College, and to the cause of Religious Philosophy, we are making arrangements to present him with his portrait in oils. A commission to paint the portrait has been given to Mr. Leslie Brooke. We think that many of Professor Upton's friends, students and admirers will desire to be associated with us in this gift. Subscriptions of any amount not exceeding two guineas will be received by Mr. Jacks, 28, Holywell, Oxford, who will furnish any further information that may be desired.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

ENGLISH LITERATURE:

I.—SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

THE famous portrait of "Admiral Keppel" in the National Gallery, which was painted nearly one hundred and thirty years ago by Sir Joshua Reynolds, is a picture that every British boy ought to be proud of. Equally famous is the painting of "Lord Heathfield," the hero who defended Gibraltar; he holds the key of the fortress in his hand, and looks out from the picture with a pleasant smile on his face, as though disclaiming any praise, but holding his head erect with the Englishman's conscious pride in having done his duty.

A portrait of Theo Gwatkin, the artist's lovely little great-niece, better known to us as "The Age of Innocence," is also in the National Gallery, as well as many other paintings by the same master.

Reynolds was our first great portrait painter, and the first president of the Royal Academy. He was born at Plympton, in Devonshire, in 1723. His father was master of the Plympton Grammar School, and educated his boy with his other pupils. Even when quite a little boy, Joshua spent his playtime in drawing on odds and ends of paper instead of playing games; he would have spent his lesson time in the same way had not his father insisted on his work being properly done.

There is a story told of Titian, the great Venetian painter, that as a child he made a picture on a white wall, using the juices of different flowers in place of colours; and this boy also, the little Joshua Reynolds, used to draw with a burnt stick on the white-washed wall of a passage in his home, as he had no money for spending on pencils and paints. At seven years old he made a drawing in perspective on the back of his Latin exercise, and one can picture the little boy's delight in producing the drawing, even though he risked reproof for idling in school time. The story does not say if he was punished, but his father wrote across the paper, "This is drawn by Joshua in pure idleness." A lady connected with the Reynolds family has this drawing still in her possession, and another one of a perch; perhaps the father felt proud of the latter, as he wrote this note upon it: "A perch, drawn not from another picture but from life."

Reynolds' first portrait was painted when he was about twelve years old, Parson Smart, a tutor, having sat to him. The boy, apparently, still had to use such materials as he could find, as this portrait, a life-size head, was painted in shipwright's colours on a rough piece of sail canvas.

At seventeen he was sent to London to study under a portrait-painter, Hudson, who, though far from being a clever artist, was the best master to be found for the boy at that time. No doubt, Reynolds was very pleased to be allowed to give all his attention to drawing and painting, as some time after going into Hudson's studio he wrote to his father, "While I am doing this I am the happiest creature alive"; but instead of serving his four years of apprenticeship he fell out with his master and left at the end of two years, returning to his father's home in Devonshire. From that time (1743) he began to paint portraits as his profession.

After the father's death, he made his home with two of his sisters until he was about twenty-six years old, when an event took place which brought about a great change in his hitherto quiet life. This was an introduction to the young Keppel, then Commodore of the English Fleet in the Mediterranean. The acquaintance between the naval officer and the artist fast ripened into friendship, and in 1749 Keppel invited Reynolds to go with him on his flag-ship to the Mediterranean, a trip of much less common occurrence for the landsman then, in the eighteenth century, than in our days.

After some time passed in cruising about, and in visiting Lisbon and other places of interest, Reynolds made his way to Rome, where he spent two years in studying the works of the great Italian masters, especially those of Michael Angelo. He then visited Florence, Venice, and other towns in Italy, returned to Devonshire in 1752, and shortly afterwards decided to settle in London.

Here he very soon had plenty of work. A beautiful painting of Commodore Keppel brought him into notice, and made him from that time the first portrait painter in England. The picture of Keppel, as admiral, which belongs to the National Gallery was painted many years later, when Lord Keppel was between fifty and sixty years of age.

Soon after coming to live in London, Reynolds met the great Dr. Samuel Johnson, and the two men formed a friendship which lasted as long as Dr. Johnson lived. He also counted amongst his chosen friends, David Garrick, Edmund Burke, and Oliver Goldsmith, and left portraits of all these celebrated men, but the only one in the National Gallery is that of Dr. Johnson. It is a life-like picture; the wise man seems to sit before us, frowning a little, with lips slightly apart, as if he had just made some witty or critical remark. Besides the portraits of famous men and women of his time, Reynolds' pictures of children are as lovely as any that have been painted. What can be sweeter than the little girl in "The Age of Innocence," in her white frock, her bare feet just showing, and her pretty baby hands folded together as she looks dreamily away over the fields where perhaps she has been playing! There are three other well-known pictures of children in the National Gallery, "The Infant Samuel," a little boy kneeling, with his hands lifted in prayer; a group called "Heads of Angels," all five fair little faces being in reality studies from one child, the daughter of Lord William Gordon; and "Robinetta," a young girl with a robin on her shoulder.

The first exhibition of the Royal Academy of London was opened in April, 1769, and Reynolds was chosen as president, and in the same year was knighted. He lived till 1792. Except for increasing blindness during his last years, Sir Joshua's life was a happy and prosperous one. As an artist he was successful from early manhood, and he owed this success as much to his industry as to his talents, as he never began any portrait without being determined that it should be the best he had yet produced.

ASSOCIATION SUNDAY.

COLLECTIONS in support of the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are to be made to-morrow, which is Association Sunday, in many of our congregations, and Mr. HOWARD CHATFIELD CLARKE, who has succeeded Mr. OSWALD NETTLEFOLD as treasurer, makes his appeal for an ample response, which is fully justified by the work which the Association is doing for the cause of liberal religious thought and life. If any one interested in the matter doubts this, let him procure from Essex Hall a copy of the last annual report of the Association, and consider what is implied by the £3,000 granted to congregations in all parts of the country for the strengthening of their ministry and the extension of their work, and by the sending out of special preachers and lecturers, and the wide circulation of the printed word. Let him consider what is implied in the new impulse of the Van Mission, and the constantly increasing value of the publications of the Association, and what is done beyond the borders of our own country for the good cause. There is no branch of the work where any slackening of energy can be contemplated; it is a work that grows, and the more one sees of it the more clear does it become that this is a greatly needed contribution to the forces of enlightenment and moral and religious progress in our common life.

As regards Association Sunday, it affords a welcome opportunity to many to make their offerings for the support of this good work. Last year collections were made in 234 congregations—an increase of eight on the previous year, though the total amount collected—£549 7s. 7d.—was not quite so much. The highest amount ever reached in this united effort was in 1902, when the total was £613 12s. Tokens of interest and good-will are heartily welcomed from many congregations, which can only send quite small amounts. The standard of giving in the strongest churches may be gathered from the following items from last year's list:—Ullet-road, Liverpool, £25 16s. 7d.; Mill Hill, Leeds, £22 11s.; Great Meeting, Leicester, £15 18s. 4d.; Hope-street, Liverpool, £15 17s. 11d.; Hampstead, £15 16s. 7d.; Bank-street, Bolton, £14 13s. 3d.; Brixton, £14 1s. 3d.; Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, £12 11s. 2d.; Chowbent, £10 1s. 3d. That list is, of course, by no means stereotyped. It may well mark an aim, which with hearty and united effort might easily be far outstripped.

These congregational collections furnish a ready means of enlisting fresh sympathy, and Association Sunday affords a special opportunity for a timely word on missionary effort and the happiness of comradeship in such earnest, self-forgetting work. But there will be many friends to-morrow unable to be present in any of the churches where these collections are being made. To them we commend the suggestion of the Treasurer's letter. The back-bone of the work of the Association must always be the list of annual subscribers, and in this connection there is one very serious consideration to be borne in mind. The helpful power of the Association has been, as our readers are aware, greatly strengthened by the unknown friend who subscribes £1,000 annually to the funds; but this most generous gift depends on the maintenance of further subscriptions amounting to £2,000, and for the present year, as was stated in the report to the recent meeting of the Council, £350 still remain to be given before that £1,000 can be paid. Thus considerably more than a fifth of the total income from subscriptions (last year £4,478 17s. 6d.) is in grave peril, and there is need of a determined effort during the next six weeks to avert the disaster which failure to complete that amount would involve.

Let all friends of the Association and its good work bear this in mind. It is annual subscriptions, to be paid before the end of the present year, which are urgently required. There are, we venture to say, hundreds of friends up and down the country who are not subscribers to the Association, and yet at heart are believers in its cause, who, if they realised the situation, and considered what the ample maintenance of the work of this Association signifies, would be glad to come in at once and lend a hand. The constant effort of the Association is to help and strengthen positive, constructive religious work, to furnish wise guidance to darkened and troubled minds, to further the cause of truth, to nurture genuine devotion and religious fellowship in the freedom of the Spirit, to work in brotherly co-operation with all those who are striving, according to their light, for the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth. No difference of opinion as to an inherited name or as to church polity ought to hinder union and the heartiest co-operation in this practical work of progressive religion. We have in the Association an effective instrument for helpful service. It deserves and should receive from our people unstinted support.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERMON. DE PROFUNDIS CLAMAVI.*

BY THE REV. JOHN HUNTER, D.D.,
GLASGOW.

"Out of the depths have I cried unto Thee O Lord. Lord, hear my voice. O Israel, hope in the Lord; for with the Lord there is mercy, and plenteous redemption."—Psalm cxxx. 1, 2, 7.

I.

THE DEPTHS OF LIFE.

The ancient maxim, "Self-knowledge is the beginning of all knowledge," has a nobler significance than that which it often bears. It is true, in the sense of St. Augustine's memorable words, "If thou sinkest deep enough into the human, thou wilt find the Divine." Not only around us, but within us, there is all the mystery and wonder of the universe. Mind and heart and soul are deeper than we know. They draw their life from infinite sources.

Thomas Carlyle, whose "gospel" has been the inspiration of much of the best thinking and best striving of two generations, made a commonplace of the fact that every great man is a miracle. But one need not be "great" in order to be a miracle. There is a Divine marvel in every common man. Our heroes and saints are not exceptional, but representative men. They reveal and interpret us to ourselves, disclose the depths of our being, the appetencies of our nature, and the possibilities of our life; their greatness is a promise and a prophecy—the justification, not the condemnation, of our aspirations and hopes.

Our human nature and human life have their depths, and not in anything are they less understood than in the depths which belong to them. Their superficial aspects are for ever hiding from us their deeper realities. What calls itself knowledge of men—acquaintance with their ordinary thoughts, passions, motives, and ways, with their various humours, caprices, follies, and weaknesses—is not knowledge of man, of the inner and real man which the outer man as often conceals as reveals. We speak at times of "a shallow man." But is there any such man anywhere? There are only too many men everywhere who are living on the surface of their nature, keenly alive to their earth-born wants and to the capacities of human existence for work and pleasure, and whose days are largely the record of mean ambitions and strivings. But to judge by appearances is nearly always misleading. The acutest judges of character are often at fault, and none go more frequently and lamentably astray in their reckoning than those who boast most confidently of their knowledge of men. In the so-called shallow man we may perceive, if we look intently and sympathetically enough, what is not shallow, and find, especially in those revealing hours when the tragic forces of existence sweep into his life, some suggestion of the latent power which needs the fiery storm to throw it up to the surface. We are often only passing judgment upon ourselves, upon our want of thought, imagination, and insight, when we proclaim our fellows to be lacking in those elements to which the great and deep things of life make their appeal. In the circle in which we live and move there would be many rich discoveries for anyone with fine imaginative power, skilled to see into

"The depths of human souls—

[Souls that appear to have no depth at all
To careless eyes."

There is a well-known poem by Matthew Arnold entitled, "The Buried Life"—a poem full of haunting music and rare introspective power. It is a picture of many a soul, and it is not difficult to fill in from experience the outline which it supplies. We all have the power of living so completely upon the surface of our souls as to be ignorant of what is hidden in their depths. It is, indeed, a large part of the pathos and tragedy of life that we are so disobedient to the oracle which bids us know ourselves. We either do not care for self-knowledge, or imagine we have it in such abundance that we can swear by it at times—"as well as I know myself!" But there are moments when we have glimpses of what we are and may be, of hitherto unknown capacities and powers, and from beneath our conscious life there rise the murmuring voices of a deeper—a buried life.

"Yet still from time to time, vague and forlorn,

From the soul's subterranean depth
upborne

As from an infinitely distant land, Come airs, and floating echoes, and convey

A melancholy into our day :

A bolt is shot back somewhere in our breast,

And a lost pulse of feeling stirs again,
The eye sinks inward, and the heart lies plain."

It is, nevertheless, true that many people here and everywhere are living superficial and shallow lives. They have either not come to themselves, they are still crude, undeveloped beings, to the great human powers and affections their vital progress has not yet advanced; or they have fallen away from their true life after it had been once and well awake, and it is now deeply buried beneath passion and pride, concealed under the thick crust of a selfish and worldly nature. But in them all slumber the powers which make of the sons of men the sons of God, and the education of their being is the unforgetting care of Him from whom they come and to whom they go. In vain do they seek to escape from His discipline, and in vain do they seek peace elsewhere than in His will. In the natural movement of their days and quietly as the night dawns upon a sleeping world, or swiftly and sharply in one of those

"strong, rushing hours
That do the work of tempests in their might,"

they will be awakened out of their vulgar ways of living, be made aware of the depths of their souls, and pass into a new world of experience and knowledge.

St. Augustine complained of the people of his day: "No man cares to descend into himself." It is a complaint which some of our wisest teachers are repeating in our day. Few there be who care to go down to the depths, to have their self-complacency disturbed, and be made to feel deeply and think deeply. Most men have no inwardness. They live altogether in the outward. The brooding, meditative gift is not in them. In past times men suffered from excess of introspective thought, but the disease which is brought on by too much self-reflection is not in our day a widespread epidemic. Too much looking within is not a temptation of the modern man. There is no country less known to him than his own soul. "After years of life together," he might often confess, "my soul and I are strangers yet." He is afraid of deeper experiences, and reluctant to be on terms of close intimacy with himself. He is quite at home in the visible and temporal order of things, but he is a pilgrim and a stranger in what the Scottish seer called "the Eternities." From the message of the spiritual life he turns away as if it touched no secret spring in his heart. It is the voices without, not the voices within, to which he cares to listen. Even in religion, though interested, and perhaps keenly interested, in the problems of its external life, in its ecclesiastical and theological controversies, in its sectarian developments and in its social and philanthropic activities, he is unmoved by its inward and spiritual power.

It is often a sorrowful surprise to the earnest religious teacher to discover how slightly interested many professedly religious people are in religion, and what a trifling portion of their time they give to its serious study. Thorough, perhaps, in everything else, they are content to be superficial in all their knowledge of the verities upon which rest the world that now is and that which is to come. Hence their readiness to run after crazes and phantasies, and the little it costs them when brought into contact with aggressive unbelief to give up altogether their religious faith. They are carried away for the most part by scraps of knowledge which have come to them from newspapers, magazines, and popular novels. They have "outgrown" what they had never really grown into, and abandoned what they never truly possessed. There is a saying of Renan's which ought to be well pondered—"In reality, few persons have a right to be unbelievers." There can be little doubt that much of the fading interest in spiritual and eternal things which has marked the days that are passing over us, much of our religious indifference, and much also of our scepticism and unbelief, are due to the want of inwardness, to the slight knowledge men in general have of the depths of their life, and to atrophy of the spiritual senses through neglect. There can be little doubt, also, that this neglect of the inner life is the explanation of the falling back of many in recent years upon traditional ecclesiasticism—the reverting to a lower type of religion which we once supposed had been left behind. Men want a certain amount of assured religious belief, but they want it without any high and prolonged spiritual effort on their part. But as long as they remain strangers to their own souls and are content to let others feel, think, and believe for them, they must be more or less ignorant of the reality of religion. We are so made that we cannot believe with a real believing anything which does not answer in some measure to our consciousness and experience. The ultimate appeal of religion is to the soul. Outside of the soul, the surest and most convincing evidence of the realities of faith can never be found. The divinity within us must be awake to discern the divinity that descends out of heaven and is revealed in the world and life. Without the personal assurance which flows out of experience, and which is the result of the actual satisfaction of our spiritual needs and yearnings, we are not able to appreciate the great testimony to God and to the things of God borne by the religious experience of mankind—the collective experience which is named "authority"—a natural and genuine authority by which our spiritual life is enriched and we are freed from the limitation and narrowness of the mere individual standpoint. Also, we can never outside of the soul find the true, and permanent ground and bond of religious sympathy and fellowship. On the surface we are divided, often to all appearance hopelessly divided, but in the depths we are one. Debate and argument, views and opinions, drive and keep us apart, but in the depths we find not only ourselves but our brethren—brethren breathing out the same aspirations and prayers, having the same passion for God, the same need of God, and the same joy in God. It is true of religion even in its intellectual aspect and expression, that those who are able to go beneath the surface and have the power of insight discover unities underlying apparently serious differences, but this is still more true of religion as an experience. Spiritual experience—the experience of the life of God in the soul—is the highest liberalising influence, and the most effective and satisfying. It gives one the power to understand and interpret many religious dialects, and to discern here and now beneath diversities of temperament and training, cult and creed, the communion of saints, the universal church of God—the Church of the Spirit.

It seems to me what we most need to bestir ourselves about in these passing days is not so much the broadening as the deepening of religion, its deepening in our own souls and in the souls of our fellows. In its thoughts of God and His ways with man, religion has expanded wonderfully everywhere since the middle of the last century; but religion must have depth as well as breadth. The breadth that does not proceed from depth is hardly worth having—it is certainly not worth crossing the Atlantic to recognise and honour. The intensive movement is more vital to progressive religion than any expansive or forward movement. The course of true religion is, indeed, most outward and onward when it is most inward. Great religious reformations ever date from the quickening and deepening of faith in the souls of men. Their inspiration and energy are drawn from deeper depths than the lower faculties of the mind. It is perhaps the most serious defect of the liberal movement in religion that it is so much more an intellectual than a spiritual movement. It is the constant approach to the things of God primarily through the intellect which sterilises much of liberal religion everywhere, makes of the churches lecture halls rather than temples of the Spirit, and their pulpit a rabbinised platform for the exposition of philosophical ideas and doctrines rather than a place for the delivery of a message from God to man. We must go deeper. Out of and to the depths of lifewe must speak. Mere affinity of opinion and belief is far too outward and contracted for the sympathy of men who speak so much of universal religion and hope and pray and work for the Universal Church. Our great facts, the things which in our hearts we all most care for, are in the depths, not on the surface. We are religious, not because the credentials of this or that form of religion bears the strain of critical inquiry and satisfies our critical reason, but because we have great moral and spiritual needs and experiences to which we believe our religion is a full and perfect counterpart, corresponding in a deep and manifold way with what we know of ourselves and of life.

To the soul, then, we must return. Out of its depths have come religions, bibles, prayers, liturgies, psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs, and it is still full of the elements of revelation. It is an unexhausted and inexhaustible world. The outward universe, the star-sown abysses of space, have none of those mysterious and unsearchable depths which we find in our spiritual being. When we gaze on all "The splendour of the morning sky,

And all the stars in the company,
And think, How beautiful it is!
Our soul says, There is more than this."

And there is more than this. God is, indeed, immanent in the world of nature and in the order of life, but He is still more intimately present in the soul of man. Our spiritual being relates us immediately to the Infinite and Eternal Spirit, and it is this Divine depth of root and resource which is the explanation of all our aspirations and the justification of the most daring hopes we can cherish of illimitable development.

THE UNITARIAN MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND.*

BY THE REV. W. COPELAND BOWIE.

THE Rev. Alex. Gordon, our most learned historian, observes that "the history of the Unitarian movement is the key to its meaning." He has outlined the history, making the year 1198 his first chronological landmark, and indicating three distinct historical stages: (1) sporadic anti-trinitarianism, native and exotic, dating from 1548; (2) a theological school of thought, making use of the Unitarian name, bent on promulgating the doctrine of the unipersonality of the Godhead, dating from 1682; (3) the stage of Unitarian church life, in which worship is decisively limited to God, the Father, dating from the opening of Essex-street Chapel, London, by Theophilus Lindsey, in 1774.

Professor Bonet-Maury finds the sources of English Unitarianism in the theological teachings of certain Spanish and Italian Protestants who, about the middle of the sixteenth century, found their way to the "Strangers' Church" in London. A fusion was afterwards effected between Socinianism and the more liberal and rational elements of Anglo-Saxon Christianity. The writings of John Bidle, the publication of Unitarian tracts, aided by the broad and enlightened views of Milton, Locke, and Newton, gave a great impetus to the movement in the seventeenth century. The writings of Lardner, Lindsey, and Priestley in the eighteenth century prepared the way for a fuller and deeper expression of Unitarianism as a theology, as seen in the discourses of Channing and the works of Martineau in the nineteenth century. Mr. Gordon has shown, however, that anti-trinitarianism existed in England prior to the organisation of the Foreign Congregations in London in 1550.

There are also Unitarians who leap the centuries, and claim Moses and the prophets as the real founders of their faith; while "Jesus a Unitarian" and "Paul a Unitarian" have been the titles of not a few ably written tracts and eloquent sermons. If the stricter discipline of modern schools of history has chastened and subdued these imaginative flights, we may still say that while there might be some sense of fitness in calling Moses and the prophets Unitarians, it would be grotesque to label them as Trinitarians, and an orthodox apologist would hardly venture to claim that Jesus or Paul would have subscribed to the Athanasian Creed.

In his introduction to Professor Bonet-Maury's valuable book, Dr. Martineau leans to the view that the Unitarian movement cannot be traced to any single teacher or specific date. It had its sources in the thoughts of many minds in many lands.

The word "Unitarian," as employed by Unitarians themselves, does not always mean the same thing. In England it is sometimes used (generally by those who dislike it and would rejoice to be rid of it) to indicate a somewhat narrow, dogmatic theology of an unorthodox type, which probably no living Unitarian would recognise as descriptive of his religious position. Sometimes it is used (especially by those who are attached to the name and who wish to retain it) to indicate a certain attitude of mind and temper in approaching religious problems, with the emphasis placed upon the idea of "unity"—the unity of nature, the unity of mankind, the unity of religion, and the unity of all in God. I am not concerned to-day in discussing which of these interpretations is the more correct or whether both are wrong. Etymology is an interesting and instructive branch of study, but it has its obvious limitations. It can tell you what a word once upon a time meant, and what, according to its derivation, it ought to mean; but, if you wish to discover its real meaning, it is necessary to learn what it stands for in the minds of the men who use it as descriptive of their thought and feeling at the present time. In England, as in America, the tendency is to make the name "Unitarian" cover the largest and best religious faith which man has attained, with a public notice to the effect that any larger or better faith which the future may have in store for man will receive cordial welcome.

In what may be called its unorganised form, the Unitarian movement in England is very much alive. It would, of course, be easy to quote examples of bigotry, superstition, ignorance, and intolerance. The rule of the priest and the social pressure of the Established Church are active, potent forces throughout the land, and they make the task of the religious reformer, and especially of the outspoken heretic, arduous and heart-breaking at times. Yet, in spite of all difficulties and drawbacks, freedom of inquiry, frankness of expression, largeness of outlook, eagerness to attain a truer theology and a better religion, are receiving in England to-day fuller and wider recognition among all classes of the community than ever before. The evidences of this are more apparent in centres of active thought and life than in ancient cathedral cities or remote villages, though "voices" even from these latter are becoming more and more frequent. The publication of Dr. Hastings's Dictionary of the Bible, with its mildly rationalistic evangelical Christianity, and of the "Encyclopædia Biblica," with its relentless overthrow of the Scriptural citadels reared with such labour by orthodox divines—these two great and notable works show to what lengths scholarship has travelled on the way to perfect freedom.

At various periods in the history of the Established Church in England the charge has been freely made that the theology of not a few of its clergy and many of its laity was honey-combed by Unitarianism.

The late Mr. C. H. Spurgeon charged his fellow Baptist ministers in the "Down-grade" controversy with being tainted with Unitarianism.

Quite recently the "New Theology" of Mr. R. J. Campbell has been labelled (too precipitately, I think) by its friends and foes alike as "Unitarian." It may, however, be said with perfect fairness that the Unitarian movement in larger or smaller measure may be discovered within the borders of almost every church and sect in England, not excluding the Salvation Army. The more extreme clerical party, in fighting for the retention of denominational religious teaching in public schools, frequently declare that "unsectarianism" is only another name for Unitarianism. In this they are not so well informed, for much of the so-called "unsectarian" teaching in public schools in England consists of a very narrow and antiquated orthodoxy. They are, however, right in proclaiming that an "unsectarian" system cannot exclude Unitarianism.

Probably the majority of the people in England to-day stand outside all the churches. The bulk of them are not anti-religious. Only a small number are avowed secularists. They are mostly indifferent to the sayings and doings of churches. These men are not without their dim visions of the eternal. They have their unspoken thoughts and feelings concerning God, and life here and hereafter. When you get into conversation with the more intelligent of them, and give an outline of what Unitarians believe and teach, many are ready to exclaim; "Why that is what I think, that is how I feel. I, too, have been a Unitarian without knowing it."

Legally, Unitarians in England are Nonconformists. They are outside the State Church. Theologically, they are often described as dissenters of the dissenters. But the Unitarian movement in England is not, and never has been, in organic communion with Nonconformity. In its earlier days the movement found its home, to a larger extent, inside than outside the Established Church. John Bidle (1616-62), whom Joshua Toulmin calls the "father of the English Unitarians," had no quarrel on principle either with episcopacy or a State Church. Thomas Firmin (1632-97), Bidle's friend and benefactor, a member of the little society of Unitarian worshippers formed in 1651, was well known to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and reckoned among his personal friends several bishops and many of the leading clergy of his day. Queen Mary, who approved of Firmin's benevolence, but was shocked by his heresies, besought Tillotson to put him right in his theology, but the archbishop excused himself by saying that Socinianism had become so firmly planted in the London merchant's mind that he was not now capable of a contrary impression. If Tillotson was disposed to be friendly, there were others who took a different view. The learned and eloquent Robert South called these early Unitarians "impious blasphemers," and traced their pedigree "back in a direct line to the devil himself."

From time to time various attempts were made to obtain a foothold for Unitarianism within the Established Church, and it was with extreme reluctance that several able men severed their connection with the State Church in the latter part of the eighteenth century. William Frend (1757-1841), writing from Jesus College, Cambridge, September 10, 1788, issued "An Address to the Members of the Church of England, and to Protestant Trinitarians in general, exhorting them to turn from the false worship of Three Persons to the worship of One True God." He published a second address a few months later, and an edition was also issued to the inhabitants of Cambridge and neighbourhood. Frend contended that the doctrine of the Trinity was "a libel on the Scriptures, and an insult to the understanding of mankind."

Because some of the older chapels bear the designation "Presbyterian," there has been a tendency among Unitarians to credit Presbyterianism in England with a breadth and tolerance in religion which are not easy to discover. As a matter of fact, the Presbyterian system has never, in any country, been particularly favourable to free inquiry in religion. Joshua Toulmin, writing in 1789, regarded it as "a ground of devout thankfulness" that Presbyterianism had no existence amongst the English Protestant dissenters of his day, and that those of them who were improperly called by that name were genuine advocates of liberty. "To walk in all the ways which God had made known, or shall make known to them," was the fine phrase of an Independent, not of a Presbyterian. To the Baptist denomination belongs the honour of having consistently repudiated throughout its history all coercive power over the minds and consciences of men in reference to their religious beliefs. The Unitarian movement owes a deep debt of gratitude, not to Presbyterianism, but to many of those to whom the name Presbyterian was given. The meeting-houses which they erected, after the passing of the Toleration Act of 1689, were not "Unitarian," for Unitarianism and Roman Catholicism were alike excluded from "toleration." Happily, the older trust deeds of dissenters rarely set out in detail schemes of doctrine. Without realising what it would lead to, they were content to found their chapels simply for the worship of God. The love of freedom took root in their minds, and by slow degrees they passed from stage to stage of Arminianism, of Arianism, and of Unitarianism. The late Mr. Gladstone, during the debates on the Dissenters' Chapels Bill of 1844, grasped the position and the principle at issue with wonderful clearness. "Here," he said, "were certain persons, who founded these chapels entertaining one creed; and the present possessors of these chapels profess another creed. I admit that that sounds startling. But, if you take the pains to follow the course of events from year to year, it is impossible to say that, at any given period, the transition from one doctrine to another was made. It was a gradual and imperceptible transition. . . . The parties who effected it made a different use of the principle of inquiry by private judgment than those who had preceded them, but they acted on a principle fundamentally the same, and, though I may lament the result, I do not see how their title is vitiated because they used it to one effect, and others to another."

About one hundred and fifty existing Unitarian chapels in England were founded by people who did not hold what would now be called Unitarian opinions. Several of them were the direct outcome of the labours of clergymen "ejected" from the Established Church in consequence of the passing of the Act of Uniformity in 1662. Only a few of these men were Presbyterians. They were not so much opposed to episcopacy, as to enforced conformity to ceremonies and doctrines concerning the value of which they were in doubt. "It is impossible to read any nonconformist clerical diary of that age," writes Mr. Gordon, "without admiring the faith of men who had to plod their way from shilling to shilling, from bag of corn to bag of peas, the wolf always at one door, the constable at the other, the brave resolution ever choking down despair and stimulating new trust in God." "If we turn," he adds, "from perceptions of truth which are variable to the formative principles of judgment and conduct which stand fast in the fidelity of conscience and the paramount obligations of religious sincerity, then I think that modern liberals of whatever school may gratefully own the spirit of the Ejected as a salt of our English history which has not lost its savour."

The secession of Theophilus Lindsey from the Established Church and the opening of a chapel in London for Unitarian worship, and the powerful, vivid advocacy of Dr. Priestley, gave a fresh impetus to the Unitarian movement in England. There was considerable missionary zeal for a time. Tracts were published in 1791 by the Unitarian Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge and the Practice of Virtue. The Unitarian Fund, founded in 1806, assisted missionary preachers; half-deserted chapels were filled by eager congregations, and new movements were started. The Trinity Act of 1813 made it legal publicly to profess Unitarian opinions and to worship in Unitarian chapels.

The literature in which the Unitarianism of a century ago expressed itself is seldom read nowadays. Naturally, it is out of touch with modern thought. Colenso on the date and authorship of the Pentateuch, Darwin on the "Origin of Species," and many another writer, have changed the mental outlook, especially of those who were unhampered by traditional creeds or by ecclesiastical authority. The tracts published by the American Unitarian Association in 1827 are not unlike those issued in England some years earlier. The first American tract bears the title, "The Faith Once Delivered to the Saints." After setting forth in an interesting and instructive way what the writer conceived to be the true Christian faith, he adds, "It is obviously a plain, simple, intelligible statement, with nothing in it to perplex the understanding, to contradict the judgment of sound reason, or to oppose the kind affections which God has planted within us." Those in our day who have felt press upon their souls are hardly likely to have "the burden of the mystery" lightened by anything quite so simple as "the faith once delivered to the saints."

"... the heavy and the weary weight Of all this unintelligible world"

In the second tract, "One Hundred Scriptural Arguments for the Unitarian Faith," Jesus is "exalted far above all other created intelligencies, he is a being distinct from, inferior to, and dependent upon the Father Almighty." "The supremacy of the Father and the inferiority of the Son is the simple, unembarrassed, and current doctrine of the Bible." The "supremacy" of the Father and the "inferiority" of the Son—this kind of terminology has passed out of use. It has no meaning or application to current Unitarian conceptions of God or Jesus, or of their relation to each other.

Tract number XI. bears the title "Unitarianism Vindicated against the Charge of not going far enough." The writer says, "The true and only reason why, as Christians, we do not go any further is our solemn, firm, and deliberate conviction that the Scriptures do not go any further." The Bible is "an authority from which there is no appeal." How very remote from present-day Unitarianism such sentiments as these appear! Try to imagine the dean of the Divinity School at Harvard or the principal of Manchester College, Oxford, giving utterance to such a dictum! How admirably these references support the thesis that Unitarianism is a "movement," not a denomination, a sect, or a creed.

The Unitarian theology of a century ago, or indeed of a half or a quarter of a century ago, is no longer descriptive of the beliefs of Unitarians to-day. And yet all the way along there has been an allegiance to principles which explain and justify the divergences. The older, like the modern, writers invariably put in a plea for mental freedom, and insist on the supreme importance of the good life. The Unitarian is called upon to "evince the excellence of his faith by its influence over his own life and conversation." Theodore Parker, sixty-five years ago (1842), said: "We look around us, and all seems to change. The theology of our fathers is unreadable. The soul of man remains the same. God still speaks in reason, conscience, faith—is still immanent in his children." James Martineau, writing a year later, gave utterance to a similar thought: "Our very progress, which is our peculiar glory, consists in at once losing and learning the past, in gaining fresh stations from which to take a wise retrospect, and become more deeply aware of the treasures we have used."

Concerning the position, work, and outlook of the churches in Great Britain and Ireland in which Unitarian worship is regularly held, I must confine myself to a few words. There are two hundred and ninety-one places of worship in England, thirty-five in Wales, six in Scotland, and thirty-nine in Ireland—three hundred and seventy-one in all. The total membership of these churches at the present time probably does not exceed forty thousand. On an average, perhaps not more than twenty-five thousand persons assemble for worship at all the churches combined at any one Sunday service. There are said to be large numbers of Unitarians in attendance at so-called orthodox churches. There are probably still larger numbers who, if they are anything, are Unitarian rather than Trinitarian, but who do not attend, except on rare occasions, any place of worship. There are certainly not a few avowed Unitarians who are seldom seen at the Sunday services. We have to confess that our religious services often fail to interest people who are intellectually in accord with us, and our imitations of the ritual of other churches do not seem to prove very helpful, except to a few. Many of the older Unitarian families leave no descendants. Their sons and daughters often become indifferent, and allow social and other very mundane considerations to prevail. There are, of course, splendid exceptions. I do not hesitate to say that some of the noblest and sweetest types of religious men and women any one could find in the British Isles have been nurtured in the Unitarian faith. But we have to admit that, were it not for the incoming of people from other churches and from "outside," many of our older congregations would long since have become extinct; and it is doubtful, were it not for the missionary zeal of converts, aided by a comparatively small number of ardent Unitarians, whether any new congregations would have been founded. If the missionary spirit were to die out, if the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the more active district societies were to cease their operations, the Unitarian movement, in its organised form in England, would probably decline rapidly and finally disappear, to the grievous detriment of freedom and progress in religion.*

* I do not myself believe that the missionary spirit will die out. Our recent experiments

Our catholic ideals are often in danger of becoming mere toys of the intellect or of the imagination, with no bearing upon character and conduct. To the listener, if not to the preacher, they become stale by vain repetition, and rapidly lose the compelling charm of their first revelation. Like the theological dogmas against which they are intended to be a protest, they are "less of a gospel than an opinion, less a faith than a creed." Dr. Jowett very truly remarked that "a church which is liberal may also be indifferent, and, having attained the form of truth, may have lost the power of it." The faith in God and immortality which we have been struggling to rid of superstition, as the late Professor Henry Sidgwick reminds us, "suddenly seems to be in the air"; and in seeking for a firm basis for this faith we find ourselves in the midst of 'the fight with death' which In Memoriam so powerfully presents."

The pew and the pulpit in Unitarian churches not infrequently serve as "temporary resting-places for theological waifs and anti-theological strays." But if there are some experiences which disappoint and depress us, there are many more which inspire us with confidence and hope. The joy and peace which come to converts to Unitarianism, the eagerness with which large numbers of the common people listen to its message when spoken by men to whom it is a gospel of life, show clearly that there are harvest fields in abundance waiting for the Unitarian who can reap. The cure for ineffectiveness, for useless beating of the air, lies in getting close and keeping close to life as it is and to men as they are.

To help men most effectually in our day, we need not only a "Free" church, but a church intelligently and enthusiastically pledged to the service of truth and love—a church which will not be content with repeating a few attenuated phrases rescued from a decaying orthodoxy. How best to combine faith with freedom, to quicken the souls of men with reverence and trust, while they remain fearless in the pursuit of truth and stalwart in the warfare against sin and wrong, is a problem which confronts Unitarian and other liberal religious thinkers and workers, not only in England, but all over the world. Perhaps when we learn to lose ourselves more completely in the ministry of religion, and give ourselves more unreservedly to the redemption of mankind from whatever hinders or hurts, and to the service of whatever ennobles and sanctifies, we may be able to do more and better work in winning men over to the side of a rational and reverent faith, and linking their lives and ours with the life of God.

As the sun does not wait for prayers and incantations that he may rise, but shines at once, and is greeted by all; so neither wait thou for applause, and shouts, and eulogies, that thou mayest do well, but be a spontaneous benefactor, and thou shalt be beloved like the sun.—Epictetus.

with the Unitarian vans will doubtless revive a consciousness of need and opportunity which the work in many of our chapels is apt to hide from us.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE PRESIDENT'S ITINERARY.

THE first of the series of meetings to be addressed by the Rev. Joseph Wood, President of the National Conference, in the province of London and the South Eastern Countries, was held at Richmond on Tuesday evening. There was service in the Ormond-road Free Church at eight o'clock conducted by Mr. Wood, whose sermon was on the subject: "Does the Modern Man need a Church?" At the close of the service the Rev. Felix Taylor took the chair, and conference was invited on various important subjects affecting the welfare of the churches, but there was no time for any real discussion. In London, at any rate, with its great distances, it seems to us a mistake to attempt the two things in one evening. A full service of inspiration, with the appeal of a sermon, is one thing, helpful and adequate conference on vital subjects is another, and each requires a whole evening to itself. On Tuesday it was a united meeting of the congregations of Richmond, Wandsworth, Acton, and Wimbledon, that was aimed at, and they were all represented in the congregation of about sixty. Wandsworth sent a considerable contingent. The Revs. W. G. Tarrant, A. Hurn, F. Allen (secretary of the Provincial Assembly) and J. Harwood (secretary of the National Conference) were among those present. The service was certainly helpful, and showed what might be done and enjoyed by fuller co-operation.

Mr. Wood's sermon was an appeal to thoughtful earnest men, really of religious temper, who have ceased to feel any need for church fellowship. Its plea was, that since they believed in nature, in reason, and in conscience, they should recognise that the church was the greatest institution for the promotion of goodness; and if they did not realise that they would get any good from association with a church (though they certainly would be the better for it), they ought to remember that they had good to give, and the help of their presence was needed.

In the after conference Mr. Wood spoke of the Guild movement, which the National Conference Guild's Union was founded to promote, and the question of the supply of students for the ministry, which the churches ought to feel as their own very practical concern. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant expressed the gratitude of those present to Mr. Wood for his helpful visit.

Horsham, Maidstone and Brighton are the place on Mr. Wood's list for the three following evenings this week, while this (Saturday) evening he is to speak at Stratford, in the West Ham-lane Church,* and to-morrow (Sunday) morning he is announced to preach at Essex Church, Kensington, and at Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, in the evening; then on Monday at the Free Christian Church, Kentish Town; Tuesday at Dover; and on Wednesday evening the final conference of the series is to be held at Dr. Williams's Library, Gordon-square. That should secure a large gathering of ministers and members of our London congregations.

ONE gift well given is as good as a thousand.—A. P. Stanley.

THE PROTESTANTENBOND.

At the recent annual meeting of the Protestantenbond of Holland held at Nijmegen, the American Unitarian Association and the International Council were represented by the Rev. Dr. G. C. Cressey, who has just settled as minister at Effra-road, Brixton. Dr. Cressey was good enough to present at the same time the greetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at the public meeting on the last evening, when he spoke on the general topic of liberal religion. In a brief report, giving his impressions of the meetings, Dr. Cressey writes:—

Outside of conversations in English and German, I had abundant opportunity to test the possibility of the apprehension of thought by means other than intelligible articulate language. Next to the unbounded and solicitous hospitality extended to us the fact which at once impressed one—perhaps because we, in America at least, might so often follow the example with profit—was the under rather than over-filling of the time in the conference programme; two regular business sessions, one service of public worship, one public, or as it is sometimes called, platform meeting, several private sessions of committees, doubtless, but the remainder of the time devoted to social meetings and intercourse. This seems to me a distinct advantage. The sermon on Tuesday evening in St. Stephen's church was preached by Ds. Stenfort Kruse, of Rotterdam, who spoke in a manner eloquent in its simplicity and sincerity of the need of following the spirit of Jesus. The division of the discourse into two parts by the singing of a hymn, a custom in Dutch churches, was novel and almost startling. Unacquainted with the language, however, one was unable to judge of its effect on the integrity and impressiveness of the address.

In Holland we have apparently an example of liberalism in religion not to any extent distinct in its own organisations except in general conferences and associations, but forming a part of the churches which include many shades of belief, with ministers selected according to the predominance of orthodoxy or of liberalism in the congregation. If I may judge from conversation with several of the prominent liberals this is not altogether satisfactory. A greater measure of autonomy and distinctiveness would bring, as they thought, an enlarged sphere of influence. As one remarked, "The hand of the past is too heavy on us." We find here, too, a rule which works only one way. When the liberals have a majority in churches employing several pastors the orthodox element is usually allowed, in due proportion, a minister or ministers of that type of thought. When the case is reversed—according to my informant—no such equity obtains. This may be excellent as an example, from a liberal point of view, but it must be sometimes irksome in practice.

I can hardly speak too appreciatively of the cordiality of our reception or of the sympathy of our friends in Holland with the principles and beliefs of Unitarianism,—I might better say, indeed of the identity of their thought and spirit with ours,

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bradford: Mill-street Free Church.—On Sunday last, a special musical service was held in the above church, to commemorate the fourteenth year of the movement at Bradford. The Rev. W. E. Atack gave a capital address. The orchestral band of 35 performers, under the conductorship of Mr. F. Whittaker, gave selections, and Miss Canning, who kindly came over from Urmston, sang two solos excellently. There was a large gathering, the church being crowded.

Bradford: West Bowling.—A successful sale of work was held last week to raise £100 to buy a piano, tea tables, crockery, &c., for the Unitarian Church. The sale was opened on Wednesday afternoon, November 6, by Mr. Henry Lupton, Mr. R. W. Silson presiding. The Rev. W. Rosling explained the purpose of the sale. The second day's sale was opened by Mrs. Ceredig Jones, Mr. Edmund Lee presiding and the total receipts amounted to £100 6s. 6d.

Croydon.—For the second time Mr. H. Keatley Moore has been elected Mayor by a unanimous vote of his colleagues. Mr. Moore is amongst the oldest members of the Free Christian Church, and last Sunday, by his invitation, the aldermen and members of the council, together with the recorder, magistrates, and town clerk, attended morning service there. An excellent musical service was rendered, led by the choir which in earlier times has owed much to the skilled assistance of the present mayor of the borough. This was followed by an eloquent and stirring discussion by the Rev. W. J. Jupp, who took for his subject "The Nobility of Service," urging in a most effective manner the lesson taught by Jesus, "He that would be greatest amongst you, let him be the servant of all." Amongst those invited by the Mayor, two or three only (out of about sixty) are members of the Free Christian Church, but the impression produced, judged by remarks heard afterwards, was highly favourable to the simple, reverent service.

Exeter (Appointment).—On Sunday evening last a most hearty invitation was given to the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A., to become the minister of George's Chapel. He has been preaching at the chapel for the past five Sundays to very large congregations. Mr. Bloor has accepted the invitation, and will begin his ministry on the first Sunday in December, removing to Exeter after Christmas.

Glossop.—The Mayor of Glossop, Mr. Herbert Partington, J.P., accompanied by members of the Town Council and officials of the borough, attended Fitzalan Church last Sunday evening. The church was crowded on the occasion, and the minister, the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, officiated. Mr. Partington is the son of Captain Partington, J.P., who was mayor of Glossop for two consecutive years. The mayor's brother is Mr. Oswald Partington, M.P. for the Peak Division of Derbyshire.

Ilford.—A "welcome home" meeting was held at the Assembly Room last Saturday evening. Mr. E. R. Fyson, who presided over a good attendance, said Ilford was the youngest church in the South-Eastern Province, but its members yielded to none in their devotion to the minister of the assembly, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, who had pastoral oversight of their church. In their name he extended a hearty welcome home to Mr. Edwards from America, and hoped he would be spared to labour for them and the cause they had loved for many years to come. Mr. Edwards, who had an enthusiastic reception, acknowledged the greeting, and gave a graphic description of his personal experiences in the great Republic of the West. Thanks were voted on the motion of Mr. W. D. Welford, seconded by Mr. John Kinsman. During the evening donations amounting to a little over £30, chiefly in small sums, were handed to the treasurer in aid of the Church Building Fund.

Norwich (Resignation).—The Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., having accepted an invitation to the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne, has resigned the pulpit of the Octagon Chapel, where he has ministered since 1900. The resignation has been received with great regret and with expressions of high regard and good wishes on behalf of the Octagon congregation.

Scottish Unitarian Association.—The annual meeting of this Association was held on Saturday, Nov. 2, in the St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, Glasgow. There was a good attendance of members. The Rev. J. Forrest, president, was in the chair. The secretary, the Rev. E. T. Russell, read the annual report, which showed that during the year the committee had spent money in advertising Unitarian literature, and had made the following grants: £25 for Van work, £15 towards the expense of sending a representative to the Boston Conference, £10 to the Ross-street Church, and £5 to Dundee. Reports from most of the Scottish churches were read. The retiring officers were all re-elected, so that for the present year the Rev. J. Forrest is the president; Mr. E. Johnson is the treasurer; and the Rev. E. T. Russell is secretary. After tea the Rev. F. Walters, who is working in Scotland for three months under the auspices of the McQuaker Trustees, gave a very helpful and inspiring address.

South Cheshire and District Association of Sunday Schools and Congregations.—The Autumnal Meetings of the above were held at the Church of Our Father, Whitechurch, Salop, on Wednesday, Nov. 6. Representatives and friends were present from Chester, Crewe, Shrewsbury, Newcastle (Staffs.), Nantwich, and Whitechurch. The following ministers attended—Revs. D. Jenkin Evans, J. C. Street, J. Howard, W. J. Pond, G. Pegler, B.A., and H. Fisher Short, hon. sec. The proceedings commenced with a business meeting, the President, T. H. Hill, Esq., of Nantwich, being in the chair. The principal items considered were the advisability of starting mission work at Wrexham, and the preparation of a scheme of lessons for the Sunday-schools of the Association. The meeting authorised the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans to visit Wrexham with a view to arranging for a series of mission services. The lesson-scheme was intrusted to the secretary. Divine service was conducted by the Rev. George Pegler, B.A., who preached an excellent sermon. After tea a conference was held, the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans opening an interesting discussion on the subject, "Some suggestions for a musical festival." The Executive Committee were instructed to meet at an early date to make all arrangements for a musical festival to be held next summer. It was noted with satisfaction, that under the leadership of the Rev. W. J. Pond the Whitechurch congregation was making progress.

"PUBLIC OPINION."

The Right Hon. R. B. Haldane, M.P., Secretary for War, has addressed the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION:—

WAR OFFICE, 1st October, 1907.

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion" under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed on men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists, the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. HALDANE.

The Practical Teaching of Jesus of Nazareth.

As Found in the Gospel According to Matthew.

Thirty-four Lessons compiled by
 ARTHUR W. FOX, M.A.

The substance of these Lessons was given to a Bible Class held in connection with the Todmorden Sunday School Union, at which representatives of six Non-conformist denominations were present. The notes were found helpful by these; hence it is the compiler's wish to help other Sunday School Teachers, as far as he can. The main purpose of this little book is to bring out the practical teaching of the Christ, so that it may have its mighty influence in the formation of the character of the taught.

A FREE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

By J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

FROM THE EARLY REVIEWS.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.—“It is the book of an idealist, with the idealist's confidence in the fairer day and the larger faith, which is always welcome. Its vigour of style and the spiritual beauty of its dream should commend it to many readers.”

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD.—“Not often, however, has the dream inspired so sane and interesting a book, representing so much that is best in modern thought, and those who have, with excuse, become a little weary of discussions of this kind, will find Mr. Lloyd Thomas a stimulating exception.”

THE COMMONWEALTH (edited by Canon Scott Holland).—“His clear style, his power of making us reflect, and his wide charity . . . make the book a precious contribution to that far-off restatement of Doctrine for which many a true heart yearns.”

PROF. FRANK GRANGER, D.Litt., in the Nottingham Daily Express.—“It is the statement of an ideal which hovers before the minds of men like Harnack in Germany, Loisy in France, and of many in England. . . The originality, the freshness, the eloquence and the lofty spirit of Mr. Thomas's volume will commend it to every reader. If the many persons who, as partisans, praise or condemn the religious thought of to-day, would acquaint themselves at first hand with such books as this, the gain would indeed be great.”

MR. G. K. CHESTERTON in the Daily News.—“If the men of the New Theology desire a clear and intelligent book, a book maintaining much of their position, but maintaining it with an almost antiquated clarity and courage, they could get nothing better than this book. With much of the ultimate drift of it I cannot myself agree; but differences from its matter are almost swallowed up in my primary approval of its manner. . . Mr. Lloyd Thomas has certainly all the dignity and manly mental lucidity of the school of Martineau.”

NEW THEOLOGY SERMONS.

By the Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A., City Temple, London.

“Most important of all, if anyone still harbours the idea that progressive religion has no ‘message,’ no ‘gospel,’ no fine preaching-fibre, a perusal of these sermons should disillusion him.”—Christian World.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE second part of Dr. Hunter's International Sermon appears in our present issue, and it will be completed next week. The sermon as a whole will, of course, appear in the volume of Proceedings of the Boston Congress, and we are glad to hear that it will also form part of a volume of sermons by Dr. Hunter, to be issued shortly by Messrs. Williams & Norgate.

THE Eastern Daily Press of Nov. 15, published at Norwich, had the two following editorial notes:—"The Martineau Memorial Hall, which was opened yesterday, will serve to remind generations of Norwich folk yet to come of their heritage of fellow citizenship with a great man. A great city, as Whitman in his most widely known poem has said, is not the place of piled merchandise and of great material wealth alone. No city can have a more glorious form of real wealth than its intimate association with the great intellectual and spiritual influences of the world; and a city begins to exhibit a real quality of greatness when it knows how to honour and esteem the memory of those who bring this form of wealth to it. The name of James Martineau stands high in the associations of the city of his birth and training. His influence was a world wide influence upon the thought of his age; and, what is even more important, upon the spiritual temper and the disposition of men who came under its sway.

Most of the speakers yesterday dwelt upon the fact of the peculiar appropriateness of the memorial; for what form of memorial could be better chosen to do honour to a great teacher than one which sets up in our midst a centre of teaching and of helpfulness such as this Memorial Hall is to be devoted to? The best tribute that can be paid to any man, and the honour that any worthy man would care most for, is that men should work under the inspiration of his influence. A merely decorative memorial counts for but little in comparison with a memorial that means such earnest and vigorous work."

"APART from its appropriateness as a Martineau memorial, the point which Sir George White emphasised in his speech will impress itself upon the minds of most people on the occasion of such an opening ceremony. Sir George made a strong plea that our churches generally should realise the importance of institutional church work. We venture to extend that plea even more widely. The importance of such institutes in the general life of the city can hardly be overrated; and one of the most welcome incidents recently occurring in our civic life was the sympathetic hearing giving at a meeting of the Town Council a month or two ago to the proposal for establishing such an institute in one of the poorer quarters of the city. We believe that before long the city will come to realise the vital connection between its educational work and the work of such institutes. We spend an enormous amount on elementary education. The value of that endeavour is not, we venture to think, simply in the knowledge which is imparted to the children. Its chief value should be in its introduction of the children to habits of life and thought worthy of high-minded men and women. And in that respect, the work of our elementary schools can only be introductory,—the laying of foundations. And the unhappy thing is that in a vast number of cases it is the laying of foundations upon which no edifice is ever raised. The boys and girls leave school at an early age, and, for want of such adequate provision as these institutes might largely help to provide, they drop back again into the deplorable habits of life and thought which it is the business of education to supersede; and much of our expenditure in the schools is lost and wasted and our preliminary work reduced to nought because it is not properly followed up. There is a great deal yet remaining to be done for the life of the city in this respect; and such institutions as that opened yesterday are of untold value to the life of the city on these lines."

THE Rev. Wilfred Harris, M.A., of Bolton, has accepted the pulpit of the Unitarian Church in Adelaide, South Australia, and will be leaving this country probably in February. The earnest good wishes of many friends will go with Mr. and Mrs. Harris to this new charge. We do not willingly part with a friend and a minister of such high gifts as Mr. Harris possesses, but we recognise the importance of the work to which he is going, and are glad that the church in Adelaide should gain so capable a representative of the Liberal Faith. Mr. Harris, who is only 41, is a graduate of Durham University, and studied for the ministry at Manchester College, Oxford. As a Hibbert scholar he kept terms at Leipsic and Heidelberg, and then at Harvard Divinity School. In 1895 he became minister of the Longsight Free Christian Church, Manchester, and for the past seven years has been at Unity Church, Bolton. He has written frequently in THE INQUIRER, and has contributed book reviews to the Hibbert Journal. We do not mean to bid farewell to him from the columns of THE INQUIRER.

WE have already noticed on the appearance of the American editions, the several volumes now advertised by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in a fresh issue in this country. The British title page carries with it also a welcome reduction in price, and we should expect that many of our readers would at once send for Dr. Robert Collyer's delightful sketch of Father Taylor, and the volume of sermons by Dr. Crothers, "The Understanding Heart." President Eliot's addresses on "Four American Leaders," and Mr. Beach's biographical sketches of seven "Daughters of the Puritans," all well-known American women, should also command attention.

In an interesting leader, the Christian World asks, Is the Pulpit Free? It appears that Dr. W. J. Dawson in his story, "A Prophet in Babylon," introduces the following dialogue between two ministers:—First Minister: "My church has always given me the fullest liberty of speech." Second Minister: "Don't you know that this boasted liberty of speech means nothing more than liberty to say things your people like you to say? Begin to say the things they don't want you to say, and you'll soon discover how little your liberty is worth." To this Dr. Lyman Abbott replies in the New York Outlook that "there is no public platform in America quite as free as the American pulpit."

DR. ABBOTT proceeds to give instances from his pastoral experience in a succession of churches, showing that he had taken on many occasions a strong stand on great public questions, frequently in face of very opposite opinions on the part of his congregations. Yet on none of these occasions did any officer, or member of the church, either directly or indirectly, interfere with his liberty. His conviction is that the manner of reception of hard blows depends entirely on the way in which they are delivered. "People greatly resent the preacher who demands respect for his own sacred convictions and refuses respect to the equally sacred convictions of others. . . . Perhaps if I had attacked the traditional faith instead of frankly stating my own, I might have been attacked in turn. . . . Generally one can have a fight for the asking, and quite as quickly in the church as out of it." Our contemporary considers that it is as true of the English as of the American pulpit—"There is no freer institution."

SOME of the discussions recorded in Methodist papers concerning the future of the class meeting make reading which can only be described as pathetic by one who knows something of what the class meeting has been at its best, and who feels as he reads how difficult, if not impossible, it is for the class meeting to be again all that it has been. When some one sets forth the blessedness of true spiritual communion between soul and soul; the advantage of true co-operation in the things of the spiritual life; the helpfulness of that quiet rest from the sordid cares of life which was the peculiar distinction of the class meeting, more than of any other means of grace; the sense of the presence of the spirit of Christ at those moments when a group of his disciples are met for the express purpose of looking into his pure and gracious countenance or listening from afar to that language of his the like of which man never spake—it is all so true, and, as one may add, so timely that it ought not to need utterance. In thinking of such things a Methodist, or a man who knows Methodism, might well suppose that any Christians who had never heard of a class meeting might be very well expected to re-invent it. We who belong to the great un-classed have many a moment when we long for just that kind of meeting, for we too have souls to be saved. We cannot keep our souls alive by going everlastingly through the series of arguments which prove that religion has still a proper place in the world, that materialism and naturalism are a great deal too self-confident, and that it is not an absurd thing to worship God and to pay heed to the teaching of Christ. We would fain be with half a score of people who forget all arguments, who listen to Christ, and who are growing to be like him. If the class meeting is dead or dying, its spirit must be sent back to earth again.

No popular municipal authority yet exists at Letchworth, which is divided up into three country parishes. A movement for uniting these, for municipal purposes, has been so far successful that the official order of the Herts County Council now only waits the confirmation of the Local Government Board. It is expected that the order will come into operation by March 31, 1908. In the meantime Letchworth has been electing, for the fourth time, its advisory Residents' Council, of which Mr. J. H. Wicksteed, M.A., is the retiring chairman. This body has done good work in keeping the directorate and other authorities informed of the needs and wishes of the inhabitants.

AMERICAN Friends have been holding their "Five Years' Meeting" at Richmond, Indiana. Of the sixteen American yearly meetings, or central organisations, fourteen were represented at this conference, while fraternal delegates attended from London and Dublin yearly meetings. In all, about 200 delegates were present, of whom some 50 were women. They discussed much matter of public interest, including the industrial condition of the negroes, work among the Indians, and the anti-saloon movement. Dealing with the position of their own society, Dr. Rufus M. Jones, of Haverford College, Pa., spoke on "The Present Opportunity of Friends," declaring that the tendency to-day was to seek a "spiritual development that comes from within—a religion of the heart, in the demonstration of the spirit. Religion must be buttressed on facts of soul experience. Our one chance of success is to meet the want of religion for an inward awakening, a warm, tender personal spirit, a God who is with us. It is the religion of reality."

DR. PRÉTLOW, of Brooklyn, speaking on "Methods of Evangelism," earnestly deprecated the sensational appeal: "To produce permanent values for the church, evangelism must not play upon the surface of the sensibilities, but present a Gospel which not only warms the heart, but satisfies the intellect and moulds the will." Sensational appeals attracted moral invertebrates, who could only be supported by men of sturdier character drawn together by quite other methods. Dr. Benjamin Trueblood urged the increased intervention of American Friends in political affairs.

It is interesting to note that the Five Years' Meeting refused to sanction a return to the English Quaker custom of "birth-right membership." By a vote of 76 to 36, it adhered to the decision that the children of members should be associates only, till they themselves applied for full membership.

The nation, as represented by the British Museum (says the Athenæum) has lately been enriched by the gift of several valuable literary manuscripts. The late Mrs. Slack, of Croydon, bequeathed to the Rev. C. Hargrove, the original letters between Shelley and Miss Hitchener in 1811-12 (covering the period of Shelley's first marriage), with the request that he would ultimately leave them to the British Museum. Mr. Hargrove, however, has waived his rights, and presented them to the nation without delay. The collection includes 44 letters

(many of great length) from Shelley, 5 from Mrs. Shelley, and 12 from Miss Hitchener.

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & Co. issue this month the first number of The New Quarterly (2s. 6d.), a review of science and literature, edited by Desmond MacCarthy. The first article is by Lord Rayleigh, on "How do we perceive the direction of sound?" The Hon. Bertram Russell writes on "The Study of Mathematics," and Mr. G. L. Strachey on "The Last Elizabethan."

OUR friends in the Manchester district are anxious to profit by the experience of the visitors to the International Congress at Boston. A preliminary meeting has been held and a public conference has been arranged for. Various speakers are to deal with the things which struck them most, and the Women's Alliance in particular will come in for prominent attention as the thing in the States which seems to have impressed all who came into contact with it.

SOME lady friends of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, to mark their high regard for the Principal have presented him with a set of academic robes and case. The ladies met at Summerville last week under the direction of Lady Talbot and Mrs. J. R. Beard, and left their gift for Principal Gordon as a pleasant surprise on his return. Mr. Gordon has since written to express his warm appreciation of the gift.

THAT beautiful sermon of Robert Collyer's, "Looking Toward Sunset," rich in the old man's sunny faith, which we were happy to publish in the INQUIRER of September 28, is also separately printed in the Mill Hill Pulpit, and may be had in that form at Essex Hall, or (for 1½d. by post) from Mr. Charles Stainer, 12, Hesse-place, Hyde Park, Leeds. Mr. Stainer can also furnish a catalogue of the last fifteen years' monthly issue of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermons in the Mill Hill Pulpit.

A LETTER from the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, of Mansfield, in response to the Rev. J. Harwood's criticism of his North Midland address, has reached us too late for publication this week.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:—Communications have been received from D. A., J. W. A., C. D. B., E. B., J. C. B., J. D., F. E., H. W. F., A. H., J. P. H., E. J., W. J. J., H. M. L., T. H. R., E. H. S., F. H. V., L. W.

THE danger run by mysticism is a moral and spiritual danger as well as an intellectual one. The strength for a noble moral life, which religion gives lies in the bestowal of a Companion, a Friend, on the lonely soul of man. But God cannot be felt as a Companion, a Friend, unless the man retain a vivid consciousness of his own individuality, a vivid consciousness that he is a separate person with a personal centre of his own capable of its own volition, its own emotion, its own personal life other than that of any other person human or divine.—R. A. Armstrong.

THE MARTINEAU MEMORIAL AT NORWICH.

OPENING CELEBRATIONS.

ON Thursday, November 14, the new Hall and Sunday Schools for the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, erected as a memorial to Dr. James Martineau in the city of his birth, were happily opened by Sir W. B. Bowring, Bart., of Liverpool, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The memorial stone was laid by Miss Gertrude Martineau in April, and the buildings, of which Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke is the architect, have been completed with great expedition and to the complete satisfaction of all concerned.

The old Octagon Chapel, which was opened in 1756, during the ministry of Dr. John Taylor, stands back some distance from the entrance-gates in Colegate-street, and the new buildings occupy the site of an old house and its garden, running along the whole of the right-hand side of the chapel yard, and coming up to the pavement of the street. The main entrance is at the corner by the chapel gates. The buildings, which have been skilfully designed to harmonise with the old chapel and the surrounding houses, look remarkably well, and are seen for some distance as one approaches from the west, past the church of St. George's, Colegate. The main entrance leads through the vestibule into a spacious passage, most convenient for large meetings, extending the whole width of the building. On one side is a large class-room and the kitchen accommodation, on the other a pleasant church-parlour and cloak-rooms. The first floor is reached by a staircase at either angle of the building, on the side facing Colegate-street. On this floor is the lecture-hall and school-room, capable of seating an audience of 350. Part of the platform can be turned into a class-room at school-time, and there are two others, on either side, while other corners of the building have been turned to a like good purpose. The number of available class-rooms is altogether eight or nine, including a minister's study and committee-room. To the front of the building a second floor provides a good sized recreation-room. Altogether, the accommodation is ample (but by no means over-large) for the good work to which the building is to be devoted, and the many friends, throughout this country and in America, who have contributed to the erection of this memorial may be glad and thankful that it has been so worthily completed. The final painting has been wisely left over till the spring, when the walls will be thoroughly dry, and the furnishing is still in process; but the friends who gathered for the opening celebrations saw the buildings complete, and have every reason to congratulate the Octagon congregation and the city of Norwich on the possession of such a memorial of Dr. Martineau, and a new set of buildings so admirably adapted to good social and educational work.

It was hoped that the last £400 to complete the Memorial Fund, for which Mrs. Mottram had appealed in these columns, would have been raised before the opening, but only about half of that amount was promised. The collection at the opening service amounted to £30 1s. 2d., and the collections on the following Sunday have also to be added.

The proceedings began on Thursday afternoon with a brief service in the Octagon Chapel, which opened with a special hymn by the Rev. Dendy Agate, of which this is the first verse:

"Consecrate these walls, O Father,
Outcome of our prayer and toil,
Reared in memory of Thy Servant,
Who, upon this hallowed soil,
Sought his God in youth and found Him,
Learned to love Thy Holy Name,
Called his fellow-workers round him,
Called the children—and they came."

The Scripture lesson was then read by the Rev. Alfred Hall and a prayer of dedication offered by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, after which Sir William Bowring led the way to the main entrance of the new buildings, and, having opened the door, passed up into the Memorial Hall, where a further meeting was held.

Sir William Bowring took the chair, and was supported by the Mayor of Norwich (Mr. E. G. Buxton), Sir George White, M.P., Miss Gertrude Martineau, Miss Edith Gittins, the Revs. H. Enfield Dowson, Alfred Hall, and J. J. Brooker, Mr. and Mrs. Mottram, Mr. G. A. King (Chairman of the Octagon congregation), Mr. A. M. Stevens (Secretary), Mr. W. N. Ladell (Treasurer), and others. Among those who were present in the hall were Miss Edith Martineau, Mrs. Basil Martineau, Mr. P. M. Martineau, the Rev. P. M. Higginson, Mrs. Enfield Dowson, Miss Jevons, Miss C. Scott, Miss Shaen, the Revs. Lucking Tavener, W. Birks, and V. D. Davis.

Mr. A. M. STEVENS announced that to their great regret illness had prevented Sir John Brunner from being with them, as he had promised, to open those buildings, but they were happy in the presence amongst them of Sir W. B. Bowring.

Mrs. MOTTRAM, called on by the chairman, said that she had received a large number of letters of regret for absence, and among them letters from Lord Aire-dale, the Right Hon. W. Kenrick, Arch-deacon Pelham, Dr. Barrett, Mr. David Martineau, Mr. F. Martineau Lupton, Dr. Drummond, Professor Upton, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Mr. Charles Hawksley, Miss S. S. Dowson, Miss A. Norton, Mrs. I. M. Wade, and of former ministers of the Octagon, the Revs. A. Gordon, H. W. Perris, H. H. Snell, C. Peach, and E. Daplyn. Also a letter from Mr. Hope Pinker, the sculptor of the noble statue of Dr. Martineau in the Library of Manchester College, Oxford, offering to give a profile medallion portrait to the Octagon. Mrs. Mottram further made a statement as to the position of the Memorial Fund, with an expression of deep gratitude to the friends who had promised £200 of the last £400 for which she had appealed to complete the Fund. "We will try," she said in conclusion, "to do the best we can with the beautiful buildings you have given us."

The CHAIRMAN, who expressed his great regret that his life-long friend, Sir John Brunner, was unable to be with them, said that, as President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, he felt it to be an honour as well as a pleasure to take part in those proceedings. Having paid a warm tribute to the energy and devotion of Mrs. Mottram in the matter of that Memorial, he said that he had been reading the report of the proceedings at the stone-laying, and he thought those beautiful buildings justified in every respect the anticipations then expressed. Among his earliest recollections was that of going with his father and mother and sister to hear Dr. Martineau in Paradise-street Chapel, and although he could not then appreciate the philosophic beauty and excellence of his sermons, he still remembered, after more than sixty years, how deeply impressed he was by the beauty of Dr. Martineau's countenance and the kindly, friendly manner of his social relationships. He remembered Mrs. Martineau also in those early days, and thus had a lifelong knowledge of the wonderful character those buildings were to commemorate. In Hope-street Church, which was the successor of the Paradise-street Chapel, in Liverpool, they had a profile portrait of Dr. Martineau in the memorial tablet, and he was glad they were to have one there. But still more precious was the memorial written on the tablets of many of their hearts. Those buildings were to be devoted to the spiritual elevation of the people, the teaching of religion, and social amelioration. He hoped that hall would be of unbounded use to the community, and might help to solve some of the religious difficulties which pressed on the education question at the present time. It was well that the birthplace of Dr. Martineau should have such a memorial. But he was too great for any one city; his influence was world-wide, as they had seen during the recent international meetings in America. They were proud that Martineau was of their nationality, and the citizens of Norwich should be proud that he was born in that beautiful and ancient city. He had declared those buildings open. He hoped they would be exceedingly useful, a blessing and advantage to the spiritual health of Norwich, and to the Church with which they were identified.

Miss EDITH GITTINS, as President of the Sunday School Association, said she was glad to be there on that happy occasion to convey the congratulations and good wishes of their comrades the teachers in the Sunday Schools of their group of Liberal Churches. Those buildings were the memorial of a sweet and gracious spirit to whom children were dear, and to whom the interests of children, as beginners here of the life immortal, were constantly present. "It is right and fitting," said Miss Gittins, "that the little book which, in simple words, tells the story of the life, the character, and the services of Dr. Martineau should be written by the minister of the Octagon. He has conferred a boon on the young people of all English-speaking communities. We hear of the book being praised and prized not only in the home-land, but in lands beyond the seas. May this hall see the assembly, Sunday after Sunday, for centuries to come, of children and young people eager and affectionate, vigorous of heart and purpose, and of teachers who are their true friends and helpers, knowing a little more than can the younger lives of the lovely chances and the fearful perils of the way—knowing a little more of the wonders of the universe, its beauty and splendour; turning with them the pages of many a book of life; being learners together with them. A large and happy freedom of choice of the material of teaching is a main characteristic of the Sunday School work of our churches. It should make the work of our teachers of special service to their generation. We need religion to be wedded to life, so that God may be seen in all and all in God." And having described various kinds of subject taken by teachers, but all in the one true spirit, Miss Gittins concluded: "The Master taught us to teach thus, not only from the Law and the Prophets, but also

'From birds and flowers he drew Parables of God.'

Sincerity, devoutness, the earnest purpose, and the loving heart—these make teachers whose service is immeasurable blessing. Such be the teachers here! Holy will then be this house! 'Its walls will be Salvation and its gates Praise.'

The MAYOR of NORWICH congratulated the Octagon congregation on having secured such handsome and commodious rooms, and expressed the hope that for generations to come they would be used to make the lives of their fellow-citizens brighter and sweeter. He hoped those buildings would be a centre from which would be diffused that Christian culture which was so splendidly manifested in the life of the late Dr. Martineau.

Sir GEORGE WHITE said that he was glad to be there, and several reasons had made him wish to come. One had been the pleasure with which he looked forward to meeting his friend Sir John Brunner, of whose public work he spoke in terms of the highest admiration. And then, while he belonged to a different denomination, he had been closely associated in public work with many members of the Octagon congregation and its ministers. He acknowledged, not for the first time, the deep debt of gratitude he owed as a young man, when he first came to Norwich, to John Withers Dowson and Travers Madge. To know them was an inspiration to all that was highest and best in human life. Proceeding to speak of religious education, Sir George said that the churches had not yet realised to the full their responsibility to the young. He always held that a far larger proportion of their means ought to go for the equipment of the school rather than of the church, and he was therefore delighted to see such a building as that, which was not only an ornament, but would be most efficient for the purpose for which it was erected. He was sure those buildings would be well occupied, on week evenings as well as Sundays. They would supply them with an opportunity of doing a good deal of social work, and would, he hoped, form the headquarters of a large measure of work for young and old in places where it was needed. It was a great honour to the city of Norwich to place a memorial like that as a lasting token of the great reverence and respect and love in which James Martineau was held. No memorial of such a man could be more appropriate than a building that was intended mainly for the benefit of the children and young people of the city.

Miss GERTRUDE MARTINEAU congratulated the congregation upon entering on that beautiful building, and said on behalf of the small remnant of the Martineau family how thankful they were to see so noble a memorial of their father. It was so much in accordance with what he would have approved and liked, as giving opportunities for the kind of work in connection with the dear old chapel, in which he was deeply interested. They remembered how for many years he had superintended the Sunday School connected with his own chapel. They might, perhaps, in the midst of their joy, be allowed a little shade of regretful sympathy with the old Octagon, because it was somewhat hidden and cast into the shade by its smart young descendant, pushing out to the street front. But that was the way of the world in these days, and the old folk had to learn to yield with a good grace to their more prominent children. They saw from the dear old Octagon with what dignity the elders might stand back and watch the progress of the rising generation. Meanwhile, they all knew what it was to have a good mother, to whom they could go for strength and encouragement and uplifting; and the Octagon would always be a good mother to those schools. Among the happy and thankful thoughts of that day there were some longings which could not be repressed. Some whom they had with them when the centenary was celebrated had passed on, and some again since they met to lay the first stone. One whose heart was in that work, and whom they specially hoped to see that day, they could not see, for she was gone beyond their mortal sight. Yet it was impossible but that her spirit was with them at that time for which she had worked so ardently, and to which she looked forward with such joy. God would not blame those whose hearts were full of longing to have her amongst them as of old. They knew better than she could, all that Miss Clark was and did in connection with the Octagon, in the Sunday School and the Girls' Friendly Society, and the influence which her sweet and noble character brought amongst the young people. Surely she was amongst them now, with all her love and sympathy, and those to whom she was such an inspiration would loyally bring her spirit into all their work in that building, and it would be true that "she being dead, yet speaketh."

"Through such souls alone
God stooping shows sufficient of His light
For us in the dark to rise by."

And now, friends, said Miss Martineau, in conclusion, if we listen we may hear a voice that says, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him." Shall we not now throw wide the door, that this place which you have raised may be filled and flooded with the spirit of Christ, and the love of God and man?

Mr. G. A. KING, chairman of the congregation, speaking as one of the superintendents of the Sunday-school, said that it was a great joy to them all to meet together, to signalise the accomplishment of a great and important work; but they felt it also to be a momentous occasion for those who were active workers in the various organisations of the church. They strongly believed that James Martineau would have desired no better memorial in his native city. Wealth could have reared a more beautiful building, but in its intention and purpose not one more in harmony with the spirit and life of him whose name it bore. "Other's needs" was their motto, and the rallying cry of all their activities and those who had so generously helped them had been inspired by the same thought. He thanked the members of the Martineau family, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and friends of their own Household of Faith, and those liberal-minded men and women who, while differing from them theologically were of the soul of the Church Universal, and had been glad to aid their effort to help in building the city of God. To all these they offered hearty thanks.

Mr. A. M. STEVENS then proposed a vote of thanks to the architect and builders, speaking in the highest terms of the way in which the work had been carried out. They much regretted that Mr. Chatfield Clarke was unable to be with them.

Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE, Jun., acknowledged the resolution on behalf of his father, and Mr. W. J. SCARLES spoke for his brother and himself, in a humorous speech, saying that the builders did not usually get such thanks, which they greatly appreciated.

The Rev. ALFRED HALL proposed, and the Rev. H. E. DOWSON seconded, a vote of thanks to the chairman, in speeches full of grateful acknowledgments and happy reminiscences respectively. The CHAIRMAN, having responded, a closing hymn was sung and the collection taken, and Mr. Dowson pronounced the Benediction.

An inspection of the buildings followed, and tea was served in the lower rooms.

In the evening a very pleasant conversation was held, which was largely attended. There were no speeches, but an admirable programme of music was rendered by a number of friends, and in the course of the evening, Mr. G. A. King gratefully acknowledged several gifts which had been received. Two of these were shown on the platform, a copy of Mrs. Basil Martineau's 1899 portrait of Dr. Martineau, which she had made for the Memorial Hall, and a water colour by Miss Gertrude Martineau of Strathspey, the beautiful valley in which is the Polchar, their summer home near Aviemore. It was also announced that Miss A. L. Browne was giving a terra-cotta reproduction of Mr. Hope Pinker's Oxford statue of Dr. Martineau.

It may be mentioned here that the upper part of the central window in the hall is filled with coloured glass, containing the inscription, "In Memoriam, Maria Clark, June 24, 1907," the date of her death.

On Sunday the morning service was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Carpenter of Manchester College, Oxford. The anthem was on the words: "And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the saints who kept the word of life." Dr. Carpenter's sermon was from 1 Timothy iii. 15, "The house of God, which is the church of the living God."

In the afternoon the whole school met for the first time in the new building for a service, conducted by Mr. A. M. Stevens, Mr. G. A. King, Miss Kent, and the Rev. A. Hall. The address was given by the Rev. V. D. Davis, who also preached in the Octagon at night.

In the household of God, said Dr. Carpenter towards the close of his morning sermon, there is no room for idlers. And having dwelt upon the noble example, and inspiration of Dr. Martineau as a teacher, he concluded with the exhortation, "Be strong and of a good courage. Be steadfast and immovable, and your work shall not be in vain in the Lord."

DR. MONCURE CONWAY'S TEACHINGS.*

JUST as this volume of lectures comes to hand we hear of the death of the author, an event that imparts peculiar interest to some of the themes here discussed. There are fourteen addresses in the book (which is issued for the Rationalist Press Association), and a very brief preface, which we could have wished longer. Dr. Conway, always vivid and picturesque in style, was fully sensible, as he wrote the preface, of the readiness of "seventy-five" to run his rapier through "fifty," especially when age has been kept alert and vigorous. He seemed most anxious, however, to abstain from casting any cloud of "disillusion" on the visions of his prophetic period; excepting for corrections, dates, and footnotes, the lectures appear as they were written for his people at South-place Chapel, some twenty-five years ago. Whether, in these conditions, the title, "Lessons for Yesterday," had not better right to describe them depends on the view we take of the needs and problems of our own time.

Many readers know little more of Dr. Conway's teachings than that under his influence the services at South-place ceased to partake of the usual character of religious worship. Others, a little better informed, have seen or may even possess a copy of the "Sacred Anthology" which he published many years ago, and in which he opened up a rich vein of little-known ethical and religious literature to many. Some, no doubt, remember their mingled feelings in attending occasional services at his chapel, their sense of wonder at the personal theism of pieces sung and of negation in things said; their perception of a keen intellect in the preacher combined with a certain devout sympathy that robbed of harshness many a criticism of treasured words and ways. Above all, these persons must recall the quickening interest created as the lecturer unfolded, one by one, his stories, fables, and quaint quotations in illustration of the point of his argument. The selection of lectures before us is, in these respects, well fitted to convey an adequate notion of his method, and to explain in great degree the remarkable influence he wielded over a certain class of minds.

In going back twenty-five years with the author, we find ourselves in the midst of a battle which already seems ancient history. Should Mr. Bradlaugh sit in Parliament, might persons who published atheistic literature be punished for it—such things are important to read about chiefly as showing how close we still are to the bad old times. There are copious allusions that are equally antique, and one feels that the whole system of thought has moved away from the general positions presupposed in these arguments. Perhaps the most suggestive feature of the book is the reflection, often brilliant and charming, of that vague "cosmic" religiousness which had then recently found its most poetic expression in the pages of Professor Tyndall.

But there are subjects treated here which are of permanent interest, and Dr. Conway's lectures may well serve to challenge the integrity of our faith and practice in some ways, whether we stand to the right or to the left of the position he took up. In what sense, if any, is Prayer permissible to the intelligent man? Has Theism any real validity as an explanation of the world and as a source of moral and spiritual force? Is there a Future Life? Such questions rise afresh in every generation. Dr. Conway's answers were framed in a fuller view, and, we have no doubt, after a fuller share of religious experiences than appears in the case of certain "rationalists." It is to this difference, we imagine, that out-and-out secularists will ascribe the touches of emotion that not seldom lift his arguments above the level of prosaic criticism; though the most ardent of such readers will find little to chide as weak or temporising in the frequent pages where "Orthodoxy" catches it! The teacher was a faithful one according to his light. Higher praise who can wish? He saw the faulty tendencies among the heterodox as well as among their opponents. He believed progress to be greatly possible, and tried to make it actual by imparting noble ambitions, while he sought to remove obstacles from the path. It was, to him, a "good nature," after all that pessimism could advance, in the midst of which man's lot was cast. There at least was a ποῦ στῶ. And in regard to the future life he said:—

"As to the duration of the individual consciousness, science has not been able to give any negative or affirmative opinion. That which is called the Ego, that 'I' or 'me' which lasts through our changing forms, which identifies me with a child encased in flesh of which no particle remains with me, is something unique in nature. Philosophy has not gone beyond the threshold of its mystery. It seems to be a new-born fact in nature whose future none can prognosticate. Until more is known, no one is able to affirm with certainty that it perishes at death. It may be that this conscious Ego is a seed destined to germinate in another existence. Who knows?"

If candour, acuteness, and versatility, added to the qualities we have mentioned, appeal to the reader, here is a book well worth his acquaintance.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Religion of the Spirit, by an Unorthodox Churchman, is a well-written little book in which the more important aspects and questions of theology are dealt with from a very Broad Church point of view. The author, who is a layman, is evidently familiar with Unitarian literature, and he quotes freely from it. He does not believe in the Trinity nor in the virgin birth, nor in vicarious atonement; and he tells us that he always absents himself from church when the Athanasian Creed is to be said. The book may be of service in introducing readers to modern conceptions of religion. [J. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol. Simpkin Marshall & Co., London. 2s. net.]

Search the Scriptures, by Emily Sharpe, consists, as the preface informs us, of notes which "have sprung out of the necessary preparations for Bible Reading Classes and Unitarian Divinity Lessons, carried on through many years." The book, which will be valued for personal reasons, by Miss Sharpe's many friends and former pupils, will be found to contain much that is interesting and helpful to readers of the Bible. [Published at 63, City-road, London, E.C.]

Health in the Home Life, by Honnor Morton, is an excellent handbook, such as ought to be in the possession of every housewife. It has chapters on "Emergencies," on "How to Nurse," on "Children," on "The Mother's Health," &c., and the advice throughout is given with admirable clearness and precision. The author, who is a certified nurse and was formerly lecturer on health under the London County Council, shows an adequate sense not only of the mental but of the moral aspects of her subject, and treats these with frankness and candour. [James Clarke & Co. 2s. 6d. net.]

Ladies' Logic, by Oswald St. Clair (a son of the Rev. G. St. Clair) is a clever brochure on women's suffrage, in the form of "a dialogue between a Suffragette and a Mere Man." The subject is treated with humour as well as force of reasoning, and Mr. St. Clair's treatment of this vexed political question is well worth consideration. [Digby, Long & Co. 1s.]

THE "JOHN POUNDS" COTTAGE HOME FOR GIRLS,

8, NETLEY-TERRACE, SOUTHSEA:

SIR,—May I make another appeal for help on behalf of the "John Pounds" Cottage, which is maintained for the training and outfitting of such poor girls as are unable to procure for themselves the necessary outfit, or to find an entry into respectable domestic service, and there are very many such in Portsmouth. Girls who are leaving school, older girls wishing for experience, free from the ill conditions of their homes, and such as have lost their parents' and friends' control, are received into and cared for in our home, and efforts are made to improve and uplift them to a decent, independent, self-respecting and useful life. Of the 45 girls assisted out last year we have sorrowfully to acknowledge a few failures, but in nearly all cases our object is fairly attained, and some have been saved from a life of degradation and vice. There can be no doubt but that the home is doing, if not a very large, at least a very good work, and I very earnestly appeal for further help to carry it on, and meet its very satisfactory growth.

It was found absolutely needful last June to take part of another small house for bedroom accommodation, and also to engage a needlewoman for making up the dresses for outfits, and taking charge of these new rooms. This arrangement has added to our expenses this year, but for the ultimate success of our work it is often found necessary to keep difficult girls longer at day work under our personal supervision.

As years go on, and the number of girls in touch with us increases, more and larger rooms become a necessity.

Through death we have unfortunately lost several kind friends and subscribers, and this adds to our anxiety, as the committee are all most anxious to keep the Institution free from debt.

Its useful work is now generally acknowledged in Portsmouth; but the knowledge that it is a Unitarian work, and managed by a Unitarian committee, prevents its being largely supported here, although it has now many friends and helpers.

Donations and subscriptions will be most gratefully received, and gifts of clothing or materials for outfits by—

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE PRESIDENT'S VISITATION.

THE nine days' visitation of churches in the Province of London and the South-Eastern Counties, by the Rev. Joseph Wood, President of the National Conference, which began at Richmond on Nov. 12, was concluded on Wednesday evening by a conference at Dr. Williams' Library. The Rev. F. H. Jones, President of the Provincial Assembly, was in the chair, and the handful of people who were present greatly appreciated the opportunity of hearing Mr. Wood's sympathetic and searching address on the condition of the religious life of our churches, and what is needed for more effective service. But proper means had surely not been taken to make the purpose of the meeting known, for out of the whole of London not more than twenty-five members of our churches were present. On the previous evening more than twice that number met at Dover for conference with the President. One great need of ours, Mr. Wood said, was to bear in mind that it was religion, rather than theology, with which our churches were concerned. The old doctrinal controversies must give place in our ministry to a demonstration of the deep spiritual realities of life, interpreted in the light of present conditions of thought. The churches needed a more helpful religious atmosphere, and he pleaded for some clear conditions of church membership, which went deeper than the mere payment of a subscription. A special service of welcome into the church for the reception of new members would be helpful. One point he urged on ministers was, in the old phrase, that zeal for souls must not be cast into the back-ground by zeal for truth.

The Rev. H. Gow, the Rev. J. Harwood, Mr. Capleton, Mr. Edgar Worthington, and Mr. Alfred Thompson joined in the discussion which followed, and the chairman at the close moved a very hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Wood for the service he had rendered to their churches in that series of visits, which were greatly appreciated.

OBITUARY.

DR. MONCURE D. CONWAY.

A STRENUOUS life was brought to a close by the death, on the 15th inst., at Paris, of Dr. Moncure Daniel Conway, for many years minister at South Place Chapel, Finsbury, where he succeeded the celebrated orator and politician, the Rev. W. J. Fox. Dr. Conway was in his seventy-sixth year, and few preachers of our time could claim a more romantic youth, or a life more filled with interesting associations with men of mark. His pen was ever active, and he leaves behind a large body of books and pamphlets to attest his industry and ability. In addition to this more permanent literature, he did an immense amount of work for magazines and newspapers, and his lectures ranged over a wide field of investigation and exposition.

Born in Virginia, of a well-to-do family, holding honourable position in the community, Moncure Conway was educated for the law, but soon found his calling to be the ministry. In 1850 he joined the Baltimore Methodist Conference, and at the age of eighteen or nineteen was placed by that body in charge of twelve different congregations scattered over twenty-five miles of country.

In his "Testimonies Concerning Slavery," published during the American Civil War, he shows what social life was like in the slave-holding states, such as that in which his youthful years had been spent. His eyes owed their opening on this point, first, to the example of a Quaker settlement where negroes were treated like human beings and not cattle; and, secondly, to the general awakening he felt when, in common with many another bright young spirit, he came under the influence of Emerson, then in the plenitude of his powers. His Methodism began to melt away in the new light, and in 1852 he betook himself to Boston, graduating as B.D. at Harvard in 1854. Boston was then seething with the abolitionist ferment. William Lloyd Garrison, Theodore Parker, Wendell Phillips, and the other great heroes of that warfare were fighting against the deeply entrenched "interest" of negro slavery. The youthful Emersonian drank in their inspirations, and to the horror of his family and connections returned to them not only a Unitarian, of a type, but also an out-and-out abolitionist. Those were the days that tested many men and many churches. Dr. Conway himself emphasised the fact that, even in liberty-loving Boston, there was only one place where Lloyd Garrison could get a open platform for his abolitionist propaganda—a "free-thinkers" hall. "So this highest phase of American religion began in the lowly manger of an infidel debating-room." He was himself appointed, on leaving Harvard, minister of the Unitarian church at Washington, but his tenure was a brief one, and in 1856 he was sent adrift on account of his strong utterances on the slavery question. In this connection he says, in the book referred to above, "there were not wanting a few who, having watched their flocks in the general night, at length came forward to lay their gifts at the feet of the infant cause of Humanity—chief among whom were Dr. Follen, S. J.

May, and (though later) Dr. Channing, all clergymen of high repute in the Unitarian Society; a society which should be credited for a singular fidelity in its opposition to slavery, and which has on that account never been able to sustain a church farther south than Washington, though it has in Richmond, Charleston, Mobile, and New Orleans church-buildings, whose closed doors and silent pulpits are eloquent testimonies against the wrong which could not bear discussion, and monuments to the courage of the Church which would never, except in isolated cases, bow to that Baal. I do not sympathise," adds Conway, writing in 1864, "with the ordinarily recognised Unitarian interpretation of Christianity, but feel bound to give the above credit to those to whom it is due, and to say that Southerners unanimously regard it as a radically anti-Slavery Church."

Between his resignation of the Washington pulpit and his settlement in London, Dr. Conway spent a stormful period as a journalist, in Cincinnati (where he held his second Unitarian pulpit) and Boston, and as a lecturer in many parts in the abolitionist cause. He colonised his father's slaves in Ohio, and later took up residence at Concord. The outbreak of the war, and the notorious sympathy of a certain class in this country with the slave-holding States, led him to undertake a lecturing campaign here on the subject. Thus it came about that he received and accepted an invitation to the pulpit at South Place Chapel, where he continued in active and largely influential service till 1897. As indicated above, he was a man of many-sided mind, and had the good fortune to share the friendship of men and women of different types of genius, writers, scientists, artists, politicians, and others. The intellectual fruit of such intercourse could not but be rich, and South Place audiences were always assured of receiving mental stimulus of a high character as they listened to him. He had, besides, the graceful qualities and warm sympathies that attach disciples to a teacher, and his followers gave him equal admiration and affection. As seen from the quotation already given, he was conscious, at the beginning of his South Place career, of differences between his "interpretation of Christianity" and that of Unitarians generally. Owing his intellectual rebirth and subsequent mental development to such a teacher as Emerson, and listening, at first with Methodistic horror, and later with whole-hearted sympathy, to Theodore Parker's trenchant discourses, it was impossible for him to fit his thinking into the traditional grooves of the fellowship in which he found room and opportunity to work his own work. He went his way, leading his congregation with him. Gradually they adopted the position of "Ethical Culture," a position which has been maintained and emphasised since he retired from the pulpit. This is not the time to enter upon a discussion of the propriety of such a development, or its significance as a symptom of church history; but no sketch of Dr. Conway's life, however brief, could fairly omit reference to a subject which gave rise to deep feeling in many quarters. We give elsewhere a notice of the latest of his published works, from which some notion may be formed as to Dr. Conway's type of thought and teaching. His books include essays and tracts on many subjects, and at least one novel; but among the most interesting and valuable of his longer writings are his "Sacred Anthology" (1872) and his biographical sketches of men personally known to him, such as Emerson and Carlyle, his life of Thomas Paine and edition of Paine's works, and his own autobiography. In 1893 he published a "Centenary History of South Place Chapel," six years later a study of "Solomon and Solomonic Literature," and in 1900 a sketch in French of Paine and the Revolutionary period. This year has seen the issue of his "Lessons for To-day," lectures and addresses given in his riper period at South Place.

THE REV. FREDERIC THOMAS.

It is with deep regret that we have to record the death of the Rev. Frederic Thomas, minister for the past twenty-seven years of the Old Meeting House, Cairncastle, co. Antrim. Those who are familiar with the glorious drive round the Antrim coast will remember Ballygelly Castle, the quaint Elizabethan house, looking like a French chateau, about five miles from Larne. Cairncastle lies less than a mile inland from this spot. The Meeting House and manse stand close together, with a glorious view of the hills and the sea: It was in this retired and beautiful place that Mr. Thomas passed the whole of his active life. He finished his training at the Home Missionary College in the summer of 1880, and was ordained the following autumn. Now the whole country-side is in mourning for the loss of a singularly simple and unselfish life spent in doing good. The gathering of people at his funeral on last Saturday was an eloquent testimony to the fruitfulness of his ministry. His own congregation was there, episcopal and presbyterian clergy, and many of his colleagues in the ministry, who had travelled long distances just because they could not stop away. After a simple service in the Meeting House conducted by the Rev. James Kennedy, of Larne, he was carried to his last resting-place, as was most fitting, by four of his brother ministers. For Frederic Thomas was a stronger force than he probably ever knew himself in our common church life, and the particular place which he filled in the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church in Ireland belonged to him by virtue of the inherent qualities of his own character. Perhaps some sense of it came to him during the last few weeks of suffering, when he was deeply touched by the letters and messages he received. In his quiet home he preserved the studious habits of an older and less bustling generation. He was widely read in the best literature, especially in his chosen field of English poetry. Fragments of verse from his pen and graceful translations showed that he had a true lyrical gift, but these were only the recreations of a country parson, who lived first of all for his people, and has left the sweet savour of his goodness as a precious memory to his friends.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

ENGLISH ARTISTS: II—GAINSBOROUGH.

WE have spoken of Sir Joshua Reynolds, as our first great portrait painter, and now let us go again to the National Gallery, and look at some pictures that were painted by our first really great landscape painter.

Thomas Gainsborough, though as great a portrait painter as Reynolds, was equally famous for his beautiful pictures of English scenery. His father, a cloth manufacturer, lived at Sudbury, in Suffolk, and Thomas was born there in 1727. The boy, as he grew up, loved to wander about in the woods and fields around his home, and as he was fond of drawing he used to carry a book and pencil with him on his rambles, and make little sketches of trees and cottages.

Tom was an idle little boy when sent to school, and was often in disgrace for inattention to his lessons. He made drawings on his book covers instead of doing his work, and his school-fellows were so delighted when he drew little sketches on their books, too, that they used to do his sums for him to shield him from being found out by the master. Besides his talent for drawing Tom could copy handwriting cleverly, a dangerous gift which he ceased to use as he grew older. He once begged for a holiday in the summer-time, as he wanted to spend a long day in the woods with his sketch book, but his request was refused. It then occurred to him to imitate his father's writing, and when a slip of paper was handed to the schoolmaster with these words on it, "Give Tom a holiday," accompanied by the father's signature, the boy was allowed to go, and it was not until later in the day that his trick was discovered. When the father heard what his boy had been doing he was horrified, and said, "Tom will one day be hanged"; but afterwards when he saw the pencil sketches which had been done by the truant from school, he exclaimed with pride, "Tom will be a genius!"

Though sketching out-of-doors was the form in which Gainsborough's love of art first showed itself, it appears that he could also draw portraits when quite young. He was drawing one day in an orchard when he caught sight of a man's face amongst the trees. The man was intending to steal pears, and Gainsborough rapidly made a sketch which was so like him that though he ran away when he saw that the boy had noticed him, he was identified by the drawing as a man living in Sudbury, who for some time had been suspected of robbing gardens and orchards. In after years Gainsborough painted a picture from this sketch and called it "Tom Peartree's portrait."

When he was fifteen his parents decided to send him to London to study art, and arrangements were made for him to be under the care of a silversmith. This man does not seem to have taught him much, and the fact would hardly be worth recording were it not for the sake of comparing it with the history of art at an earlier date. Many of the great Italian painters of the Renaissance began life as apprentices to gold and silversmiths, and in one case an apprentice immortalised the name of the master jeweller under whom he worked, by adopting it for his own, Sandro Filipepi being known as "Botticelli."

Whilst under the silversmith's care, Gainsborough studied at the school of painting in St. Martin's-lane. This school was a very second-rate one, and there was nothing in the teaching or in the society to be found there that could help or inspire the lonely country boy. He was often homesick and sad, but worked on, resolved to help himself after the effort his parents had made to send him to London. At the end of three years he went back to Sudbury, but did not remain at home long, as he loved and married Margaret Burr, a beautiful girl of eighteen, the young lover being himself still under twenty.

The couple lived in Ipswich for fifteen years, and then removed to Bath, where Gainsborough, whose fame as an artist was increasing, was at once sought after by the fashionable people who came to drink the waters, and who wished to have their portraits painted.

In 1774 he returned to London, where he spent the rest of his life, except for going into the country to sketch when he could spare time from his studio. Several of his most beautiful landscapes are in the National Gallery. Amongst these, two of the finest are "The Market Cart," a wagon with children in it coming through a woodland glade; and "The Wood Scene," a picture of Suffolk country with Cornard village church in the far distance.

Gainsborough had a faithful friend in a carrier, named Wiltshire, who took his pictures from Bath to London, and who loved and admired the artist so heartily that he refused to be paid for his work, but asked if he might have "a little picture" to keep. Gainsborough was very generous and gave the carrier more than one of his paintings. "The Parish Clerk" was given thus, and for many years it belonged to Wiltshire's descendants, but is now in the National Gallery. It is the portrait of a fine old man, with the light falling full on his face as he looks up from the great Bible which is on a stand before him.

One of the most famous of all Gainsborough's paintings is the portrait of Mrs. Siddons, the great actress. It is not only the picture of a remarkably beautiful woman, but it is a masterpiece of colouring, the clearness of the reds and blues being as wonderful as the colours in the old Italian pictures.

Gainsborough was a contented, happy man, living at home with his family, and generously giving his help to younger or less fortunate men. Yet he never willingly associated with his fellow artists, and was especially unfriendly towards his noble-minded, courtly-mannered rival, Sir Joshua Reynolds. When he was dying, however, he apparently regretted his own want of courtesy and sent a message asking Reynolds to come and see him. After taking leave, Gainsborough said as Reynolds was going away, "We are all going to Heaven, and Van Dyck is of the company." He made this dying remark no doubt because of his intense admiration for the great Flemish master.

Gainsborough died in 1788, four years before Reynolds. These two men will always be remembered as two of the greatest painters of the eighteenth century in England. KATHARINE F. LAWFORD.

THE HEART OF IT.

THE question as to the condition of our churches, and what is needed to make their ministry more effective, has found a good deal of utterance during this last week or two. The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, who, as President of the National Conference, has just completed a most interesting series of visits to churches in the Province of London and the South-Eastern Counties, gave to a meeting at Dr. Williams's Library on Wednesday evening (ridiculously inadequate as representing our London churches) an account of the impressions he had gathered from these and similar visits in other parts of the country; and at the autumn meeting of the London District Unitarian Society on the previous evening (also poorly attended) we gathered further impressions, and particularly those arising out of experience of the Van Mission. Our own columns have also contained recently several earnest utterances, pointing to serious defects and urging new faithfulness along definite lines.

Mr. TARRANT went to the heart of the matter, at the London District meeting, when he recognised the good work done by the Van Mission in spreading the light, and giving to earnest, thoughtful people broader and more wholesome views of religious truth; but then went on to ask: When such people, with their quickened interest, make their way into one of our churches, what do they find there? How is it that the eager convert, glowing with enthusiasm in his new vision of truth, and rejoicing in the liberation of spirit which it has brought, so often is chilled when he enters the circle of one of our congregations, and fails to find there fit nourishment for his new and eager life? Do these people really care, he says to himself, for the faith which they profess? Does it fire them with zeal, and compel them into close fellowship for a common work? But if they hold it merely as an easy form of enlightenment, and the gathering for worship as a thing lightly to be set aside for the sake of some more vivid interest, what is it really worth?

On this Mr. WOOD also laid stress on Wednesday evening, giving his own experience, and that of others who had come in from orthodox evangelical circles, of the distinct difference of atmosphere prevailing among Unitarians in their places of worship from that of their old religious home. The matter might well be open to debate, whether the change of atmosphere from that of the old evangelical piety to that of the unemotional steadfastness of the earnest Unitarian was altogether to the disadvantage of the latter. There is not, we imagine, any uniformity of atmosphere either in one connection or the other. Much must depend on the spirit of the ministrations in the particular church, as also on the habit and temper and character of the particular people gathered there. And we do not propose here to attempt any analysis of the different atmospheres, or to carry any further the examination of morbid symptoms.

What we desire is rather to enforce Mr. TARRANT's plea. If we are in earnest about the life of our own church, there will be in it a healthy atmosphere, whether it is of the most stimulating kind or not. And what we have really to do, is not to think so much about ourselves, or how we compare with others, or what others think of us, but just to realise what we are called to do in the world, and how the church, if we are true to its ideal and its claim upon our service, will help us to do it; or perhaps we should say, how we can best do what we have to do, in that religious fellowship, which in itself makes of us a living Church.

We want the Church ideal, said Mr. WHITAKER the other day. We want the true spirit of worship, we want the CHRIST ideal, the compelling of his conscience in our hearts, we want to make brotherhood real among men, and show that the Church cares for that, said Mr. VAUGHAN. It all drives us back to the heart of the whole matter: we have to live our own true life, with God in the world, and acknowledge it together, in all simplicity and earnestness, always open to new revealing of His truth, attentive to His inward voice, bidding us hold fast to righteousness at all cost, and in the spirit of the purest humanity, in CHRIST's spirit, do our FATHER's will. If we do that, we are a Church, a living Church. It is not for us to ask whether we have a large or a very small place in the world, and what people say or think of us. Let them talk, if they will; let them scoff. We have to forget ourselves, and remember God, and His good purpose in our lives, and rejoice to be doing His work, in true brotherly fellowship, seeing more and more of His glory, and the nearer coming of His kingdom on earth. That means the uplifting of our common life, social betterment, and with it the abiding joy of fellowship with the Eternal.

THE DRAMA AND THE CENSORSHIP.

RECENTLY, as our readers will be aware, a petition has been signed by a large number of literary authorities urging the abolition of the censorship of the drama. In response to their memorial, the Prime Minister has consented to receive a deputation and to consider seriously their request.

We very much hope that the censorship in some form or other will be maintained. Whether the particular official now set apart for this difficult duty is a fit and proper person we do not know. If it can be proved that he has passed immoral plays and inhibited plays which were quite harmless, by all means let him be changed. But in the present condition of the English drama, the demand that it should be set free from all restraint seems to us dangerous and unjustifiable. It would, of course, still be possible for public authorities to proceed against a theatrical manager who presented an improper play. This is, however, a very clumsy method, and it would not prevent the play being acted for several weeks. It is, further, unfair to theatrical managers and actors, who may have gone to great expense and trouble in the staging and preparation of the play. If you abolish the censorship, managers for their protection will have to become censors. They will reject many plays which now they are prepared to accept. The dramatic author will be really more completely at the mercy of chance if the censorship were abolished than he is at present. He would have first to pass the censorship of a manager, and he would, secondly, run the risk of condemnation by a County or Borough Council. He is much more likely to be judged justly and upon a principle which he can understand by a qualified man wisely chosen than by a theatrical manager and a Borough Council.

The real difficulty at the present day arises from the morbid convention which makes sex problems the chief subject of all serious plays. It is ridiculously out of proportion to the real interests of ordinary healthy life to treat the relations between the sexes as the main element for dramatic representation. No one, indeed, grows tired of beautiful love-stories. We wish there were more of them in novels and plays. Courtship is only a small part of life indeed, but it is a thrilling and delightful period, and if described by good men or women who feel the romance and splendour of it, we should never complain of its being overdone. But it is not simple love-stories which most of our serious dramatists, possessed by a sense of their Art, feel called upon to treat. They need a vicious husband or a vicious wife, or at least a husband or wife with a vicious past, in order to reach to the height of their capacities. No other subject seems to them worth while, and they claim to be allowed to handle this painful and often unclean topic as they choose. The great need of the drama to-day is not freedom from the censorship; its great need is freedom from the obsession of the sex problem which blinds its representatives to the greatness and variety of human interests. Life is not merely made up of unhappy or wicked or martyred husbands or wives. In real life we are occasionally concerned with other things.

It is a significant fact that SHAKESPEARE'S great tragedies are rarely concerned with sex problems. "Othello" is the only one where the main interest depends on the relationship of a husband and wife. "King Lear," "Macbeth," and "Hamlet" are concerned with human interests and difficulties and sins other than those of marriage.

In SHAKESPEARE'S days women's parts were played by boys. It is possible that since women came upon the stage the tendency to dwell on sex problems has increased. Actresses have demanded exciting situations, opportunities for expressing subtle deep emotions, and these are most easily provided for them in marriage troubles. But, with the growing freedom of women, and with their larger interests, it ought to be possible to find a few tragic situations for them apart from marriage infidelity.

So long as English dramatists who wish to be taken seriously flutter like moths around the marriage torch, singeing their wings, and—what is much worse—obscuring its light, they need a censor. Each one tries to be a little more extreme, a little more daring than the last. English society looks on in a half-fascinated, half-horrified way, in something of the same spirit with which it watches the performance of a lion-tamer. The right word for these plays is, indeed, "risky." It is a more ignoble pursuit than lion-taming. The lion-tamer risks his own life amid the wild savage forces in contact with which he earns his living. The dramatist lets them loose upon society. He gives a false, exaggerated view of the relation of the sexes. He makes men imagine that the abnormal is the normal, and that wild sexual passions are the main interest in life.

We need more virility, more imagination, and wider sympathies in our dramatists. In the name of Art and Nature, as well as of Morality, they would be wise to leave sex problems alone for a little while, and to wander in that larger and more wonderful outdoor world of adventure and suffering and effort which is entirely free and open, and where no censor ever dreams of interfering.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERMON.

DE PROFUNDIS CLAMAVI.*

GLASGOW.

"Out of the depths have I cried unto Thee, O Lord. Lord, hear my voice. O Israel, hope in the Lord; for with the Lord there is mercy, and plenteous redemption."—Psalm cxxx. 1, 2, 7.

II.

THE CRY FOR GOD OUT OF THE DEPTHS.

1. The cry for God is the natural utterance of the awakened soul of man in every land and age—the cry of man whenever and wherever he freely speaks out of the depths of his nature, an aspiration which all history confesses. It may not always be an intelligent or conscious cry, but a seeker after God man has always been and must ever be, because from God he comes, begotten, not made, and with a nature so constituted that only in God can he find his full and final satisfaction and rest. The surface of his life may often appear to say one thing and its depths quite another thing, but it is the cry from the depths which reveals what he truly is and what he most needs. It is his inmost wants and desires, not his hard, cold sense and keen understanding, which read most rightly the secret of his life. It is not to the surface of his life his real spiritual needs belong, but only those poor selfish cravings which are often mistaken for them by ill-instructed minds. Outwardly he may seem to long and cry for other things more than for the presence of God, and to find his peace and joy in them; but when his soul is moved and searched, and the fountains of its great deep are broken up, in all those crises which throw light on the inner condition and movement of his being, the cry for God is seen to be fundamental, and his longing to connect his life in some way with the life of the invisible and eternal world, an irrepressible longing, which tends ever to rise into a strong and intense passion.

In the eighteenth century some clever men found an easy settlement of the religious problem by dismissing religion as the invention of priests, forgetting that it was the religious instincts and wants which made the priest and his institutions at all possible. Man is as distinctively a religious as he is a social being—religious for the same reason as he is domestic, political, intellectual, and artistic. It is his nature unfolding to divine realities and relations, seeking its corresponding objects and satisfactions. The beginnings of his religion, like the beginnings of all other things in his history, may be dim and vague and feeble, but it ought to be judged as we judge the other things, by its essential quality and most perfect expression, and not by its early and rude forms, not by the physical beginnings of spiritual instincts and the sense-conceptions and sense-language of primitive religious feelings. It is not independent of his mental and moral development, of his general condition and culture. It grows as he grows. It is not something grafted upon his nature from without but comes out of his nature—a component part of himself, which he must train and develop. Revelation is necessary to its purifying and perfecting, but revelation does not and cannot create the religious capacity or instinct. For a revelation to be received and understood there must be that in man to which it appeals—something in the depths of his personal being akin to what is in the infinite and unsearchable depths of God. Matthew Arnold used to say that religion, if it is to continue, must be based, not on traditions and documents, but on its natural truth; and, of course, that is so, if by its natural truth we mean its correspondence with the fundamental facts of life and with the generalised experience of mankind. We need have no hesitation in affirming boldly its natural truth when we call to mind that there is nothing in the history of our race older and more universal, more central and commanding than religion. Its many and various forms, the great historical religions and the older religions out of which they grew, all have their roots struck deep in human nature. Whenever and wherever man begins to reach the truly human level, he begins to worship, and, the more human he becomes, the more do the sentiments of awe and reverence, dependence and submission, reinforced by the larger trusts which longer and wider experience give him, become natural to him. It is just because he is what he is that his spiritual attitude is that of a believer and worshipper, and had he no other Bible than his own soul, he would never be without a living witness for God. In its wonder and awe, in its fear and hope, in its sense of goodness and truth and beauty, in its aspiration after perfection, in its shame because of failure, in its joy in obedience and service and sacrifice, and in all its idealising yearnings which never in these mortal years get their right and complete command over the life, he who watches and studies wisely and patiently will discover God, and from the sympathetic observation of all such experiences have the persuasion confirmed that religion is natural to man, and that the more of God man takes into his life, the more natural he becomes. It would be easier to deny the tendency of matter to a common centre, or the tendency of man to draw to his fellows, than to deny the native tendency and movement of the human soul to God. Its only language may be a cry, but how full of meaning and prophecy is that cry!—the cry of the soul for God as it comes to us down all the ages, from every people and from every literature which utters the mind of a people, and from the noblest spirits of every race interpreting most clearly the voice of humanity as it speaks through them. "All men," said Homer, "cry after the gods." "Through all heathendom," said Saint Paul, "men seek after the Lord, if haply they may feel after Him and find Him." "The human soul," said Tertullian, "is naturally Christian. The testimonies of the soul [to God] are as true as they are simple, as simple as they are universal, as universal as they are natural, as natural as they are divine." "If we will but listen attentively," said Max Müller, "we can hear in all religions a groaning of the spirit, a struggle to utter the unutterable, a longing after the Infinite, a love of God."

There is not, I am persuaded, even a touch of exaggeration in the statement that the greatest discovery of the nineteenth century was the discovery of the ancient religions,—of what men before Christ and before Moses, in a dim and far past and in countries like Egypt and India, thought about God and life. It has made us hear clearly, rising from every land and from every age, from men divided by leagues of space and centuries of time, ignorant and enlightened, mean and noble, the cry out of the depths of the soul for God, even the living God.

Everywhere in our own age as well as in past ages may be heard the cry for God. It is the advanced spiritual desire of humanity. To-day, as yesterday, out of the depths of his soul man cries to God, however much his noisy passions, follies, and cares, and the tumult of the world, may make inaudible the voice of his deeper mind and deeper heart. It was once said by a celebrated English lawyer of our time that the man who could not get on without religion, who could not occupy his mind with love, friendship, business, politics, science, art, literature, and travel, must be a poor kind of creature. It is, on the contrary, the man who can be wholly satisfied with outward and earthly things apart from God who is the poor kind of creature, living upon the surface of his nature, with the energies of his spirit still dormant, or so suppressed and overborne that they are in danger of dying out. To be truly a man is to have infinite capacity for God, to have desires, affections, and needs which the things of civilisation and culture cannot satisfy, which can only be satisfied in communion with the Divine. Man, be he what he may, is made to be a seeker after God; and, because he cannot escape from himself, he cannot escape from God. The cry for God is heard as soon as he comes to himself, and it becomes clearer and more persistent, more passionate and pathetic the further he goes into himself. In his more careless moods he may play with doubts, amuse himself with negative views and cheap rationalism, and treat religion as if it were merely something to be examined, pulled to pieces, and criticised; but out of the depths of his unbelief the unconscious faith of the soul never fails to make itself heard. In spite of crowds of easy livers here and everywhere and the extraordinary supply of the means of excitement, which, giving vivid interest and attractiveness to the outward life, tend to stupefy and deaden the religious sense, men cannot live utterly contented without God. The way they are caught now and again by all kinds of fanaticism proves that the promise and potency of religious faith are still there. It is also an impressive fact that behind all the surface play of the forces in modern life that tend to obscure or even to challenge and deny the fundamental religious beliefs, the religious nature of man may be seen asserting itself—and often in strange ways. The philosopher's bold statement that man becomes more and more religious is not without warrant. The religious affections may be changing, here and there, their objects and modes of expression; but they are not losing their energy. The phenomena which are often regarded as signs and proofs of religious decay are more justly interpreted as religion passing through a process of transformation. There are movements of thought and feeling, far below the upper tides and disturbing agitations which we see and chronicle, that bear silent but strong witness to the upward-looking instincts and impulses of humanity. There is, as has often been pointed out, hardly a form of the deeper thinking and deeper living of our time which does not reveal the inherent and indestructible religiousness of man. The ideal substitutes for God upon which our more serious and cultivated unbelievers have been spending their devotion these many days prove how deep in the soul and unescapable are the religious instincts and needs. The cry for truth, for right, for justice, for love, is a cry for God. The moments in which men long and strive most purely and intensely for the triumph of truth and justice and love are moments of unconscious prayer—the prayer which includes in its sweep all our unselfish desires and yearnings and strivings. "All my springs are in thee," said the Hebrew Psalmist. God is at the root of all our ethical aspirations and purely human enthusiasms, and to Him they lead. Without Him they remain partial and fragmentary; only in Him do they find their centre and unity, their strength and stay.

2 And thus are we led to observe that the cry for God is the aspiration of the whole nature of man when he is true to it. It is not an isolated thing, the expression of one faculty, a single experience; it is in the structure and strain of our being, in its living unity of powers and tendencies and manifold needs. In all the faculties and affections of our complex nature we are created for God, and through them all we are meant to rise upward to Him.

God is a demand of the intellect as well as a longing and need of the heart. Reason seeks God as much as any other of our nobler human powers, and in the fully and symmetrically developed man it is ever seen to be a faculty of reverence. Out of the depths of all true and earnest thought on the mystery of the world and life the quickened mind aspires to God, rises instinctively to the one supreme and universal Mind which the order of things bespeaks, and in which alone it can find a satisfaction proper to its characteristic nature. Thought as it deepens confirms and justifies our own religious aspirations and trusts. We remember Shelley's line,

"O thou Immortal Deity

Whose throne is in the depth of human thought," and the philosopher's saying that, while a little knowledge inclineth men to atheism, depth of knowledge brings them back to God. Because in mind as well as in heart and conscience man is kindred to God, the full development of the mind must lead at last to God, and God, we may be sure, has not made the world in such a way that the honest and thorough study of it will lead men away from Himself. The complete witness of the human reason to God is yet to come, but God is its inevitable goal. The end of all deep thinking must be to put men more and more into the mood and attitude of worship. Much of the intellectual movement of our times may indicate instability and superficiality, but in its more serious forms it is the modern spirit dissatisfied with old and familiar explanations of the material and spiritual universe, yet seeking the innermost truth and reality of things, crying in its own way with the ancient Hebrew for God and confessing with the Christian saint that it is restless until it finds rest in Him who is the truth itself.

And what has been said of deep thinking may be said of every form of deep feeling. It must render us religious, deep calling unto deep. The sense of beauty which makes poets and painters, and is more or less in all men, belongs to the image of God in man and is meant to put us in touch with the spiritual and eternal in all created things, and to raise us into communion with him to whom St. Anselm prayed as the Absolute Beauty. Admiration, the power of perceiving, appreciating, and enjoying things lovely and great and wonderful, rises into adoration. Seas and skies and mountains, the dawn of day, a night of stars, kindle in the susceptible soul the sentiments of worship. The feeling which noble music produces is of the nature of aspiration; it is a longing towards some divine good, consciously or unconsciously a longing toward Him who is the source and centre of all good and all harmony. It has been said of the highest kind of music that the hearing of it enables one to realise his immortality. It touches and awakens some inner sense which our common experience only partially satisfies; it fills the mind with those great and high feelings and with those far-reaching thoughts that pass beyond all earthly bounds and wander through eternity. And the same is true of all the deeper parts and passions of our being. Our human affections at their best have their flower and fruit in spiritual and heavenly aspirations. Our human love of goodness stirs in us the divine love, and is included in it, and opens our nature to God as the sun opens the earth in spring. Our desire of excellence—excellence of character and excellence of work—bears witness to God and is a cry after His perfection. Our moral aims and strivings are fulfilled in religion. Our religion is the fulfilment of the deepest instincts, affections, needs, and experiences of our nature. As the fire seeks the sun and the river the ocean, so does our life in all its deeper and larger aspects move towards Him who is its beginning and its end. We must have God to understand and explain our nature and life. He is the answer to all that is good and best in ourselves—to our powers of intellect, imagination, affection, conscience, to our faculties of worship, aspiration, and hope. "When I awake," said the Hebrew saint, "I shall be satisfied with God." "The life of man," said one of the fathers of the Christian Church, "is the vision of God." Out of the depths our souls, as they awake, cry for God; and only with God can they be finally satisfied—only in communion with Him, spirit with spirit, can be found the fulness of life and joy.

3. The cry for God is an importunate cry in all the critical moments and experiences of life. What is true of the depths of our nature is true of the depths of our life as it is lived in the world. In its deep places where we come face to face with its serious realities we are taught what we truly are and are made aware of our divine relations and needs. Under the pressure of critical emergencies the most fundamental things in our life come to the surface. In our great and sore straits, if at no other time, the soul reveals its divine kinship and lifts its cry to God.

It is true that our deep experiences are not all sorrowful. Joy may be as profound as grief, and out of the depths of joy every sound-hearted man breathes forth his gratitude not merely for good found or achieved, but received. In all its supreme moments life turns inevitably to God. In all our deep experiences God has a part, and almost in spite of ourselves we recognise it.

But be glad and grateful as we may and ought to be for all that brightens and sweetens life, yet as things are now it is sorrow more than happiness that drives us to God. We have a nature endowed with infinite capacities for pain, and there is no escape but an ignoble one from some form of the pain which makes the cross the true symbol of a large part of every man's life. "Perhaps to suffer," wrote the Swiss theologian, Vinet, in one of his letters, "is nothing else than to live deeply. Love and sorrow are the conditions of a profound life." A truer word was never spoken. The tragedy in which we live is meant to educate us. There would indeed be no understanding of life at all did we not know from experience that in life's depths we receive our best teaching and training. Out of the depths have come the finest poetry, the finest music, the finest speech of the world. "The Bible owes its place in literature," said Emerson, "not to miracles, but to the fact that it comes from a profounder depth of life than any other book." Out of the depths have come the most inspired and inspiring of the psalms of faith, both ancient and modern. Out of the depths men have brought blessings which are rarely found in green pastures and by still waters. We never know how much God is the one great need of the soul till we go down to the depths.

There are depths of physical weakness and suffering out of which men cry to Him whose will concerning them they often forget in health and ease, and only remember when sickness comes in and shuts out the world.

There are worldly anxieties and losses which rudely break up all the shallow optimism that has no deeper root than the self-complacency produced by prosperity, and which take men down below the surface of life into its deep places where they learn to pray, or to pray as never before.

There is the sorrow of bereavement, common yet never commonplace, the pain that comes from broken fellowships; and in their spiritual solitude and desolation men are driven to seek higher help and comfort than any which the world can give.

There are experiences of fallibility in understanding what we ought to do; critical hours in life when serious responsibilities press, and grave questions which mere acuteness cannot settle; and men, in their extremity, feel the need of a wisdom which they do not find in themselves, and of a guidance which their fellows cannot give, and they cry unto God, "Lead me and teach me."

There are depths of disappointment and failure in our best work,—sympathies imperfectly met, misplaced trusts, broken purposes, and defeated hopes; and it is especially the ministry of such noble failure to draw forth the powers latent in every human being, and to make God felt as the one supreme necessity of life.

There is the struggle with moral limitation and weakness,—the sensitive temperament, the ill-balance of a finely endowed mind, the want of will-power, the over-growth of impulses good in themselves,—inheritances which make life so tragic to many—the struggle with forces within and forces without which seem adverse to a noble development, and which make the most aspiring and faithful souls feel that they cannot do the things they would.

The Psalm from which our text is taken is familiar to many devout people as one of the seven penitential psalms. It was dear on this account to Chrysostom, Augustine, Savonarola, Luther, Hooker, Owen, Baxter, Wesley, and to many more of the elect spirits of our race. And it surely cannot be that any man capable of deep feeling can be wholly ignorant of the saddest tragedy of human life which is seen in the conflict between desire and duty, in the effort to reconcile the ideal and the actual, and to be at peace with God. Who does not know of this struggle, interpret it how he may? Who has not cried out in the agony of it, O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me? When one passes in review before the tribunal of his heart the irrevocable years, what wonder if

"Oft his cogitations sink as low
As, through the abysses of a joyless heart,
The heaviest plummet of despair can go."

Though it is only one experience of the spiritual life and must not be allowed to overshadow all the rest, yet the sense of dissatisfaction, deepening into the sense of guilt, lies near the heart of all personal religion worthy of the name. It marks the awakening of the higher life; it is, as Carlyle once said, the beginning of all progress. The worst conscience is not the one that is most sensitive to evil and most troubled by wrong things done and good things left undone, but the conscience that is so dull as to have no experience of guilty pangs and terrors and that can make its possessor able to fit his greatest transgressions into a self-satisfied view and scheme of life, and to reconcile himself to memories of passion and shame. In men morally healthy and well developed the sense of sin, of evil done with full consent of the will, is a reality, not a shallow emotion, but a profound grief, the thought not of their weaker moments, but of their sanest hours. It is simply self-knowledge.

It is a universal law of the higher life, that, the better a man becomes, the more sensitive he is to sin, and not only to his own sin, but to the sins of his fellows, the sins of the nation, of society, of the church, of the community in which he lives. It is the best men who feel most keenly the burden of human iniquity and confess the abounding moral evil of the world as if it were their own evil; it is they who are most conscious of the wrong-doing of their fellows and suffer most on account of it, and not the actual wrongdoers themselves. It was so with the Hebrew poet. The pathos of the great lovers and helpers of mankind is in his psalm. It is the utterance of an intensely personal emotion, but it is more than personal. He speaks in the name of Israel, merging his own feeling in the shame and repentance of his people. "I wish," said that great prophet and saint of God, Frederick Denison Maurice, "to confess the sins of my land and time as my own." It is almost impossible to imagine a truly godly life, without this underlying sensitiveness and sadness, without this suffering heart of holy love and sympathy which is the thing likeliest God in this world.

In ancient India, perhaps more than fifteen hundred years before our Psalm was written, men sung a hymn which obviously came out of the same experience as this passionate Hebrew poem of penitence and prayer. It was translated into English out of the dead Sanscrit tongue by Prof. Max Müller. These are the English words:—
Let me not yet, O my God, enter into the house of clay:

Have mercy, Almighty, have mercy.
If I go trembling like a cloud driven by the wind:

Have mercy, Almighty, have mercy.
Through want of strength, thou strong and bright God, have I gone wrong:

Have mercy, Almighty, have mercy.
Wherever we men, O God, commit an offence before the heavenly host:
Wherever we break the law through thoughtlessness:

Have mercy, Almighty, have mercy.
(To be concluded.)

THE RELIGION OF COMMON CONSENT.

[These three verses represent the universally accepted idea of duty towards a Higher Power, towards our fellow creatures, and towards ourselves respectively. By a curious coincidence, the initials of the three virtues sought are those of Robert Louis Stevenson, a coincidence not inappropriate in its suggestion.]

For all we own as most divine,
The wealth that would itself impart,
Where wisdom, grace, and goodness shine—
The REVERENCE of a humble heart.

For all God's creatures, great and small,
For sin, for sorrow, and for blindness—
Ready to answer every call,
Unfailing founts of LOVING KINDNESS.

In strong temptation or distress,
When waves of darkness o'er us roll;
When joy is keen, when dangers press—
The sovereignty of SELF-CONTROL.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE autumn meeting of this Society was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, with the usual pleasant social prelude, before the business. There was a small attendance, of less than a hundred members and friends.

The PRESIDENT, Mr. JOHN HARRISON, took the chair, and in a spirit of faith and good courage reviewed the condition of the churches supported by the Society. The congregations of Lewisham and Kilburn, he said, were busily engaged with building schemes, and he hoped they would soon be invited to the stone-layings. They were proposing to group the Bermondsey and Peckham congregations under Mr. Hipperson's charge, and contemplated an effort to establish a new congregation at Sydenham. The offer of a generous friend to give £50 for five years if others would unite to give a further £450 would remain open until the end of the year. £250 of that amount had been promised, and he appealed with confidence for the remaining £200. The President also made a warmly appreciative reference to the recent visit of many of their friends to America, and spoke with affectionate sympathy of Dr. Herbert Smith, who had done so much to enable a number of their ministers to go. He welcomed the presence of the Van in their London suburbs, rejoicing in the success of the effort, and added that it was their duty as a Society to follow up that effort.

Dr. C. G. CRESSEY, of Brixton, in the course of a vigorous speech, referred to the prevalence of religious liberalism in all the churches of Massachusetts and throughout New England, attributing it to the existence there of Unitarian churches and organised Unitarianism, more than to any other cause. He distinguished between proselytism of an ignoble sort, and the earnest desire to let others share the truth, which was felt to be vital to the interest of humanity. They were not, he thought, always quite appreciative of the privileges they enjoyed and the greatness of their opportunity. He quoted a saying of Dr. E. E. Hale's to the effect that the Unitarian Church stood in any community for the greatest things, both in the matter of physical well-being, and in moral and spiritual matters; all these things were implied when they supported a Unitarian Church. And they must work; for the stars in their courses did not fight for any cause, if those on whom it rested simply sat and gazed at the stars. They must have zeal without bound, and by constant effort seek to promote that truth, which was so precious to them, and so vital to the welfare of mankind.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT declared very earnestly that they had a cause, and in that great city had their own work to do. And they felt, if they did it, that there was an Almighty Goodness, which helped them to be and do their best. He asked them to look at the map of London, and their churches dotted about upon it, and then to consider the great spaces where they had no churches. They were glad to know that there were many other liberal churches besides their own, but they had their own work to do.

Referring to the Van Mission, he said that they ought certainly to preach the Gospel; but when those whom they thus interested came into one of their churches what did they find? There was the most urgent duty, which must first of all be attended to, that strangers who came in might feel the power of a genuine religious life in them. How are we going to fill our own churches with our own people? he asked. It was partly the minister's problem, but not altogether. They must make their churches really alive, fill them with abounding energy. "Feel that we are here to do good work, and if we do it, the good God will help us."

The Rev. CHARLES ROPER also spoke. The stars in their courses are fighting for us, he said, but we have got to hitch our wagon to one of those stars. And he went on to plead for more cohesion among Unitarians, that they might be knit more closely together and filled with a common enthusiasm. The Van Mission has been an unexpected and unprecedented success, and he urged that they should go out, north and south and east and west, and by means of lectures in public halls let the people hear their message.

On the motion of Mr. H. B. LAWFORD, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the President, and the meeting terminated.

CHURCHES IN GREATER LONDON.

SIR,—May I draw the serious attention of your readers to the following matter? Greater London contains something like six millions of inhabitants. We (Unitarians) have 33 churches of various kinds scattered about in this great multitude. Five of these are domestic missions, six others are doing work of a similar character, leaving 22 which are churches in the usual meaning of the term. One of these is superfluous and one other is in a neighbourhood where only domestic mission work would be effectual. Twenty churches, therefore, practically represent the effective strength of the denomination in London. But, of these, at least six are within the limits of Lesser London, giving just 14 to the vast outer ring with its four million inhabitants, roughly, one to every 285,000 people. Moreover this outer ring is spreading towards the country and becoming more populous every day. Enormous and increasing neighbourhoods are filled with precisely the class of people who attend church or chapel. Numbers of our own persuasion are amongst them.

Dissatisfaction with the ordinary teaching of orthodox places of worship was never more widely spread or loudly expressed, yet, in very many cases, it is necessary to travel for miles to reach a home of liberal religion.

Take, e.g., that section of Greater London which extends from New Cross to Bexley, from Bromley to the Thames, 80 square miles, with half a million of people. There are just two places in the whole district, viz., Lewisham and Plumstead. Is it not time that something was done?

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—On Sunday evening, November 17, the Mayor, Lieut.-Colonel Pollit, attended the new Unitarian Church, at Richmond Hill, with the aldermen, councillors, and officials of the borough. The building was crowded, chairs and forms having to be brought into the aisles. It is estimated that 500 were present. The collection, which was on behalf of the infirmary, amounted to £11. The preacher was the Rev. John Barron. The handsome pulpit was the gift of Lieut.-Colonel Pollit, who also laid the foundation-stone of the church.

Bolton District Sunday-School Union.—The 21st annual meeting was held at Horwich on Saturday, Nov. 16, and was well attended. In the afternoon the business meeting was held, the Rev. Peter Holt, the retiring President, in the chair. The committee's report noted a continuance of healthy activity in the schools of the Union; offered a cordial welcome to the Rev. Felix Holt, B.A., recently settled in the district as assistant minister at Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, and, after recording the various meetings held during the year, concluded with an expression of thankfulness that during the 21 years of the Union's existence so large an amount of good and useful work had been done and was still efficiently maintained. After the election of officers, the retiring President delivered an address on Sunday-school work, and dealt with its aims and difficulties in a most sympathetic and admirable manner. After tea, the newly-elected President, Mr. Walter Simpson, took the chair, and referred sympathetically to the loss which the Union and the Horwich congregation had sustained in the death of the Rev. R. C. Moore. He went on to give some interesting reminiscences of the formation of the Union just twenty-one years ago—paying a well-deserved tribute to the Rev. J. J. Wright, to whose zeal and capacity the Union owed its formation. In conclusion he referred to the struggle going on over religious education in the day schools, and said that its tendency was to exalt the importance of their Sunday-school work. The Rev. J. J. Wright gave a most interesting account of his experiences of Sunday-school work during his recent visit to America. After paying a tribute to the earnestness and thoroughness and culture that was put into the work of the American schools, he pointed out as one of the most important differences between the schools here and there, that whereas for the most part our schools were almost entirely recruited from the working classes, the American schools drew their scholars from the cultured classes. This radical difference resulted in other differences:—(1) The American Sunday-schools were smaller; (2) They were more select; (3) They met seldomer; (4) Their schoolrooms were different—more like parlours; (5) The teachers were different—most of them are ladies—many of them paid; (6) The children contribute to the cost of the school. Mr. Wright concluded an all-too-short address by saying that we had many lessons to learn from our friends across the sea. They were full of a splendid devotional spirit, full of ideas, indeed far ahead of us in ideas, and they, too, like ourselves, felt the need of Sunday-school work more than ever. During the evening music was rendered at intervals by various friends, and a most enjoyable and successful gathering was concluded by the usual votes of thanks.

Bolton: Unity Church (Resignation).—After service on Sunday evening, the congregation met to receive a letter of resignation from their minister, the Rev. Wilfred Harris, M.A., who has accepted an appointment to the Unitarian Church in Adelaide, South Australia. A resolution expressing sincere regret was passed by the congregation. After seven years of faithful service at Unity Church the severance will be greatly felt by all its members.

Halifax.—On Thursday, November 14, the Rev. Charles Peach, of Manchester, gave a lecture in the Northgate-end Sunday-school, in connection with the National Conference Union for Social Service, on "Ideal Commonwealths." Mr. Peach pointed out references to a looked-for improved social state both in the Old Testament and in the New. He afterwards dealt more fully with the "Ideals" of Plato's "Republic," Sir Thomas More's "Utopia," and William Morris's "News from Nowhere." The lecture was most interesting, and it was a pity that, owing to other important local attractions, the attendance was small. There was a brief conversation at the close of the lecture. Mr. E. B. Stott was chairman.

Horsham.—On Wednesday evening, November 13, a religious service was conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, president of the National Conference, which was followed by a conference in which the Revs. J. J. Marten, who presided, G. Lansdown (Billingshurst), H. Clarke (Godalming), Misses F. Jupp and E. Kensett, Messrs. J. B. and D. Price, W. J. Hoad, E. Perry, W. Albery, W. Larring, E. W. Martin and A. Knight took part. Several representatives of the Billingshurst congregation were present, and a collection amounting to £2 16s. 6d. was taken for the funds of the Conference, to be forwarded as the joint contribution of that and the Horsham Church.

Huddersfield.—On Sunday morning the Mayor, Alderman Balmforth, accompanied by members of the Council and various officials, attended service at the Fitzwilliam-street Church, when the Rev. E. Thackray, Ph.D., was the preacher. The service was enriched by special music, and Dr. Thackray's sermon was from Prov. xiv. 34, "Righteousness exalteth a nation." The collection was for the Huddersfield and District Victoria Sick Poor Nurses' Association.

London: Brixton (Welcome Meeting).—A meeting was held on Monday evening in the Effra-road School-room to welcome the Rev. Dr. C. G. Cressey as minister, in succession to the late Rev. F. W. Stanley. Dr. Cressey, our readers will remember, comes to us from America, where he has held pastorates at Salem, Northampton, and Portland (Oregon). Mr. John Harrison, who took the chair, offered a very cordial welcome to Dr. and Mrs. Cressey. He referred with much feeling to the loss they had sustained in Mr. Stanley's death, and to the help his brother ministers had given in freely supplying the pulpit for the months following his death. Then Dr. Cressey came for a few Sundays, and they were anxious that he should stay with them. Dr. Cressey offered to stay for nine months; but according to the rules of that congregation they had to make a permanent appointment, and that had been done. They sincerely hoped that Dr. Cressey would remain with them. Mr. T. H. Terry read letters of apology for absence from Mr. Nettlefold, Mr. H. Epps, and others, and Mr. David Martineau, on behalf of the congregation, joined most cordially in the welcome the chairman had given. He recalled memories of that congregation since its formation in 1839, and having made sympathetic allusion to Mr. Stanley's death, said how glad they were to have Mrs. Stanley and her daughter still among them. He also gave a message of greeting and congratulation which he had received in a letter from one of their former ministers, the Rev. T. L. Marshall. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant welcomed Dr. Cressey into the fellowship of London Unitarian Ministers, and the Rev. J. Bernard Snell, of the Brixton Congregational Church, on behalf of Dr. Barlow, who was also present, and other liberal ministers in South London, joined in the welcome. He spoke of his friendship with Mr. Stanley, at whose funeral he had for the first time entered that church, and urged them to rally round their new minister. They had a great field of work in South London, he said, and such men as their minister were needed. Dr. Cressey gratefully acknowledged the welcome.

Manchester: Lower Mosley-street.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held last Saturday, the Rev. A. Cobden Smith presiding. The treasurer, Mr. A. Ernest Steinthal, and the secretary, Mr. Arthur Wood, gave satisfactory reports respecting the progress of the congregation. From the record of attendances at the services it was found that a higher average had again been reached. In a brief address the chairman referred to the earnest and loyal spirit of fellowship which had marked the past year, and appealed for wider interest and enthusiasm for their religious services. A very pleasant evening was spent.

Southport.—Anniversary services were held on Sunday at the Portland-street Church, conducted by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, assisted by the Rev. Matthew R. Scott, the new minister. Mr. Dowson took for his subject at the morning service, "Minister and People," and in the evening spoke on "The Churches and Social Questions." There were large congregations, and the collections, which were good, were in aid of the funds of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. On Monday evening there was a congregational tea, followed by a public meeting, which was largely attended. Mr. W. J. Worden, who presided, said that they as a congregation were looking forward, he was confident, to a very happy and prosperous year. Mr. Scott had already won not only their sympathy, but their affection. He was heart and soul in his work, and ready to listen to any suggestion for the benefit of their church. Their sympathy must be shown by co-operating with him in his work. The Rev. Crowther Hirst said that he was glad on their account, as well as his own, that Mr. Scott had come to Southport. He gave to them as a church, and to Mr. Scott as minister, his very hearty and sincere wishes for their prosperity and happiness in future. He then proceeded to speak of the remarkable international meetings recently held in Boston, which he had the happiness of attending, and emphasised their great lesson of the binding power of religion as distinguished from the divisions of theological thought on the subject of religion. The Rev. H. W. Hawkes also spoke. Dr. Harris moved a vote of thanks to the speakers, which was seconded by Dr. Wormald, and carried with applause. Mr. Jagger read a letter of apology for non-attendance from Mr. Ashby, who said he wanted to give his right hand of fellowship to Mr. Scott. The Rev. M. R. Scott then gave a short address, and proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman and all the helpers, which was agreed to with enthusiasm.

Wakefield.—The annual Sunday-school services were held in Westgate Chapel last Sunday, followed on Monday evening, as has been the custom for some time, by the annual soiree of the congregation. Special interest attached to this year's anniversaries, as the occasion was taken to invite the Rev. W. Rosling, of the West Bowling Church, Bradford, to preach the Sunday evening sermon, and to be the guest of the evening on Monday. The Rev. A. Chalmers preached the morning sermon, and went to West Bowling in the evening. Presiding at the soiree on Monday evening, he happily described the situation as a welcome offered by one of the oldest congregations in Yorkshire to the minister of the latest born daughter-church of the Free Faith. Their guest had passed through a serious ordeal, and suffered much from the blind zeal of deacons, and had been cribbed and confined by trust deeds both north and south of the Tweed. The Chairman then called upon his son, Mr. T. Marriott Chalmers, who proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Rosling for his sermon on the previous evening, and of warm sympathy with him in the painful experiences through which he had passed. He congratulated Mr. Rosling on having brought a devoted bodyguard of earnest people with him, and trusted that he would find as cordial a welcome all round as he was now receiving in Wakefield. In his reply Mr. Rosling gratefully acknowledged their kind recognition of his endeavour to build up a harmonious, enlightened, and enthusiastic church in the populous suburb of Bradford, where he had encountered difficulties, not with his congregation, but with officialism and the dead hand. He had felt the warmth of his welcome in Mr. Chalmers' beautiful home and in the circle of the congregation, and he would carry back delightful recollections of this his first, but he hoped by no means his last, visit to their ancient city. His own warm-hearted and loyal people would rejoice to hear of his hospitable reception, and he thanked all present for helping to clear away any sense of isolation or unfamiliarity he and his flock might feel in their new land of Promise and Hope. The musical programme filled up the rest of the evening, and the gathering closed with a few appropriate remarks by the minister on the coming winter's work, and with a grateful reference to all who had helped him in chapel and school during the year that had gone.

"PUBLIC OPINION."

The Right Hon. R. B. Haldane, M.P.,
 Secretary for War, has addressed the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION :—
 WAR OFFICE, 1st October, 1907.

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion" under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed on men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists, the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. HALDANE.

INTERLINEAR BIBLE

printed in the same clear type as the
 India Paper edition published last year

BOUND IN CLOTH, 7s. 6d. net. IN LEATHER, from 10s. net

THE INTERLINEAR BIBLE is so printed that both Authorised and Revised Versions may be read with ease from one text. It displays at a glance the position, extent and nature of the differences between the Versions. The simple plan adopted is shown in the accompanying passage, which, read along the upper line throughout, gives the Revised Version, and, along the lower, the Authorised. "Since the publication of the Revised Version," says the Westminster Gazette, "several attempts have been made to produce Bibles in which the different readings of the two Versions would be clearly seen. By far the most successful effort in this direction is The Interlinear Bible."

A Prospectus, with specimen page, will be sent on application.

UNIVERSITY PRESS
CAMBRIDGE

23 November 1907

The Cambridge Modern History is a general history of Europe and her colonies, and of America, from the Middle Ages to the present day. It records the story of the nations throughout the period in which the problems that still occupy us came into conscious recognition, and were dealt with in ways readily intelligible to us as resembling our own. The work, therefore, embraces that part of the history of the world which is of highest value and interest to the reader of to-day.

Particulars of the instalment terms under which the History can now be obtained on a small initial payment, are given in a book, The Cambridge Modern History; its Origin, Authorship and Production, which will be sent free of charge to any applicant. The book gives more than a mere statement of terms. Amongst other matters of interest, it contains the following extracts from The Cambridge Modern History:

The Trial of Savonarola.
The New World and its Gold.
Martin Luther and the Diet of Worms.
The Spanish Armada.
Richelieu.

The Last Campaign of Gustavus Adolphus.
The Impeachment of Stafford.
The Overthrow of the French Directory.
Napoleon at St. Helena.
The Assassination of Abraham Lincoln.

It also contains Lord Acton's original scheme for the History, an important document never before published; information as to the editors and writers of the work; a historical sketch of the University Press at Cambridge from the days of the first University Printer, in Henry VIII.'s time, to the present day; and some description of various processes of printing and binding.

This book will be sent post free to any address on receipt of a postcard addressed I3, H. Department, Cambridge University Press Warehouse, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.

THE PRACTICAL TEACHING OF JESUS OF NAZARETH.

As Found in the Gospel According to Matthew.

Thirty-four Lessons compiled by ARTHUR W. FOX, M.A.

The substance of these Lessons was given to a Bible Class held in connection with the Todmorden Sunday School Union, at which representatives of six Nonconformist denominations were present. The notes were found helpful by these; hence it is the compiler's wish to help other Sunday School Teachers, as far as he can. The main purpose of this little book is to bring out the practical teaching of the Christ, so that it may have its mighty influence in the formation of the character of the taught.

JESUS OF NAZARETH.

An Historical and Critical Survey of His Life and Teaching.

By ETIENNE GIRAN, Pastor of the Old Walloon Church, Amsterdam.
Translated by E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.

Unity says: "A remarkable and intensely interesting book. In a marvellously clear and graphic manner the author, through his translator, lays bare the results of the work of New Testament critical scholarship, takes his readers through simple analytical processes, enabling them to dissect the gospel records for themselves and to judge what is unhistorical and what is true. With this little volume in his hand, the intelligent reader who has also the ability to write is able to compile from the New Testament an approximately accurate account of the life and teaching of Jesus."

MANUALS OF EARLY CHRISTIAN HISTORY.

Edited by J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., D.Litt., D.D.

THE EARLY CHURCH:

Its Orders and Institutions.

By A. HERMANN THOMAS, M.A.

This little volume is a sequel to the manual entitled Christianity and the Roman Empire, by the Rev. W. Addis, M.A. (1893). Assuming the relations to the State described in that book, it endeavours to delineate in simple terms the complicated phases of the internal growth and organisation of the Church.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE sermon on "The Nobility of Service," preached in the Free Christian Church at Croydon, by the Rev. W. J. Jupp, before the Mayor and Corporation, on November 10, has been printed, and we trust it will be widely read. Sympathy, born of love, as it was in Christ, is the secret, said Mr. Jupp, of all true service. We can do very little for others until we care for them, and enter, by sympathy, into their real lives. And he quoted the words of a speaker at the recent meeting, when the Croydon Guild of Help was established: "Remember, there is no friendship except on terms of equality." Can we dare to follow Christ, asked the preacher, and do as he did, of whom it was said: "He is gone to be the guest of a man that is a sinner"? The sermon concluded with an impassioned plea for practical sympathy with the unemployed, and what will be when mutual service is the ideal of our common life.

PREACHING in Upper Chapel, Sheffield, on Sunday morning, from the text, "I entreated for the children's sake" (Job xix. 17), the Rev. C. J. Street referred to the articles by Mr. G. R. Sims in the Tribune on "The Cry of the Children" and "The Black Stain," dwelling upon the miseries of neglected childhood and the cruel wrong done to the little ones, not only by drunken and degraded parents, but by the community, which left so much undone which might be done, to diminish, if not to make an end of the evil. Drink, he said, was the chief cause of this great mass of suffering, and he made a strong plea for the exclusion of children altogether from the public-house, and for powers to be vested in the people to restrict, if not to abolish, the liquor traffic.

MISS CLEMINTINA BLACK, of the Women's Industrial Council, gave an address on Wednesday, November 13, to the Congregational Social Union of the Old Meeting, Mansfield, on "What High Wages Mean." Low wages, she said, led to deterioration of the human machine, and went on to give instances of how the improvement in wages had secured better work. She described what good results had followed in the Lancashire cotton trade, from the shortening of hours and restriction of child labour, and the raising of wages. With improved conditions the people improved, and for the better wages the employers got better work. Employers also were improved, for when they could not keep down wages they used their brains and found better methods of production. So a premium was put upon good work, good management, and intelligence.

MR. FRED MADDISON, M.P., gave the address last Sunday evening in the special series of services being held in Trim-street Chapel, Bath. "The Liberal Spirit in Religion" was his subject, and the Bath Herald on Monday devoted nearly a column to a good report. One reason for the alienation of such large numbers of the people from the churches, said Mr. Maddison, was the unreality of so much religious teaching. He then went on to give a clear exposition of the service rendered by liberty to religion, and to exemplify this from the record of two small religious bodies, the Quakers and the Unitarians in England and America. "We claim," Mr. Maddison concluded, "and we think we can prove that this liberal spirit in religion is of God, because it has given, and is giving, great workers for human progress and for truth. Jesus sought to lead men to the Father, and we simply seek to follow him along the path of duty, the only path which leads to God, to his God and to our God—to his Father and to ours. The liberal spirit in religion is not—as some of my friends seem to think—a mere denial of old faiths and venerated creeds. It is the only religion which many of us can accept, because its affirmations are few and simple, and it does in all their fulness, in all their consolation, and in all their strength, steady one amidst the uncertainty of this mortal life. It does give us a foundation, a hope—we can rest, absolutely rest, on the Eternal love."

ADVERTING to our note last week on "Is the Pulpit Free?" we see that Dr. Fairbairn supports strongly the affirmative answer given by Dr. Lyman Abbott. He says:—"I do not think there is any freer place for a young man of mind than a Free Church pulpit, notably of the Congregational order. I speak of it as pre-eminent, for I know it best, and, therefore, love it most of all. It is years since I told my young men that it was the freest post in the kingdom, infinitely freer than anything that could be obtained in journalism, especially under modern conditions." Dr. Fairbairn then follows Dr. Abbott's line, and cites the experience he passed through in the two Scottish churches of which he was successively minister. He says he was often charged with heresy by his brother ministers, but never by his own churches, whose members, though necessarily differing from him at times, never put the slightest restraint upon his liberty.

BY the death of Dr. Reuen Thomas, of Harvard Church, Brookline, Congregationalists, on both sides of the Atlantic, have lost a notable leader. His is another instance of a happy division of the labours of a lifetime between the two great branches of the English-speaking race; for, although Dr. Thomas had spent over thirty years on the other side, his American labours were preceded by an honourable record here, first as assistant to the Rev. Newman Hall, at Old Surrey Chapel, afterwards at Sittingbourne; and, still later, at Birmingham, Liverpool, and Stepney. Those early formed friendships, of which there were so many, he retained to the last. Beyond his life-work as a minister, must be reckoned his share in the successful promotion of a more cordial feeling between the two countries.

A CORRESPONDENCE in the Spectator on Prayer Book Revision has produced some interesting letters. Last week "W. J. B." as a Churchman, pleaded for opportunity for a freer utterance in the prayers of the Church:—"Often we feel the need of a short form of prayer or praise, composed by the minister, to suit the present circumstances of the parish. It should be sanctioned and provided for in any effectual revision. No doubt it should be straitly safeguarded. Churchmen are for the most part conservative, and long use of the best has made cultured minds fastidious. Care should be taken not only that precious old forms should not be crowded out by extempore effusions, but also that incompetent clergymen should not exercise the privilege." And, suggesting a test of fitness, this writer adds:—"Very few would approach the majesty and tenderness of James Martineau, strangely enough the peerless prayer-writer of the nineteenth century; but many, earnestly and reverently addressing the Divine Father, would voice the desires of a multitude of fellow-worshippers, whom our stately system leaves as dumb as they came. We should at any rate gain largely in reality."

ANOTHER correspondent, in the same connection, calls attention to Dr. John Hunter's "Devotional Services," quoting the opinion of the Glasgow Herald, "that, since the time of the late Dr. Robert Lee, no single individual in Scotland has done more to raise the standard of devotional worship, and to create an appreciation for liturgical forms of prayer." "In my judgment," the writer adds, "it is the best book of its class. It shows in a marked degree the comprehensive scope of Christian worship, and meets, I think, the want expressed by your correspondent in his letter, which appears in your issue of the 16th inst., for a service of worship which, 'whilst securing a certain amount of uniformity, makes for that unity in spirit for which we all pray.'"

ACCORDING to a writer in the Co-operative News, Mr. Thompson Seton's "Injun Camp" for hooligans has proved so great a success that thousands have been established in different parts of America. The camp affords "a return to nature" for lads who belong psychologically to an earlier, more primitive, social order than our own; and its wholesome, interesting open-air life under authority develops their best qualities. There can be no question that the artificial conditions of city life are entirely unsuited to the development of some types of character, which, under other conditions, would prove of value to the community. It is interesting to observe that in these camps authority, exercise, and adventure are not confounded with mere military discipline and drill.

THE American Liquor League is in distress:—"We dislike to acknowledge it, but we really believe the entire business, all over, has overstayed its opportunity to protect itself against the onward march of prohibition. . . . Five years ago a united industry might have kept back the situation that now confronts us, but to-day it is too late." The situation is briefly outlined in the words of the New York correspondent of The Times:—"Widely restrictive statutes are in force in thirty-four States, so that the population of the 'dry' (prohibition) territories, now number 33 millions." The only State east of the Rockies which contains no prohibition area is Pennsylvania.

IN awarding the prizes in the Urban Cottages and Small Holdings Exhibition, Letchworth, 1907, the judges remark upon the persistent tendency of the competitors to build and design week-end country cottages, of more or less complex design, instead of absolutely simple town-cottages for workmen. They have awarded three first prizes to the cottages designed by Mr. C. M. Crickmer, two being exhibited by Miss A. J. Lawrence, and have commended these for economical arrangement and suitability to their object. In one, especially, the placing of the copper and the coal shed under cover, but outside the house, is noted. The judges deprecate the tendency in other cottages to regard the living room or parlour as a general passage, into which the front door opens, and out of which the stairs ascend; and they point out that by shutting out draughts one economises fuel.

REV. J. LINEHAM writes in the United Methodist, "No more revolutionary ideal was ever proclaimed than that every member of humanity is a child of the Heavenly Father and therefore capable of Christlike character and eternal life. This ideal is destined to revive again and again until the Kingdom of God comes. We are actually living now in the midst of such a revival. Never was there more passionate indignation against social evils, never more earnest desire to alleviate human misery, never so widespread an enthusiasm of humanity."

WHEN Francis Thompson was buried at Kensall Green on Saturday, November 16, there were roses in the coffin sent by Mr. George Meredith, with the testimony, "A true poet, one of a small band," and the Spectator last week spoke of him as "one of the few religious poets of this generation." He was forty-seven when he died. He was the son of a doctor of Ashton-under-Lyne, and was for five years at college at Ushaw, and then at Owen's. His after life in London was tragic. His "Poems" first appeared in 1893, "Sister Songs" in 1895, "New Poems" in 1897. Mr. Wilfred Meynell, who writes of him in the Athenæum as "a poet of high thinking, 'of celestial vision,' and of imaginations that found literary images of answering splendour," quotes some exquisite verses of Thompson's (as does the Spectator) on the village girl "Daisy" whom he saw at Storrington in Sussex:

"The hills look over on the South,
And southward dreams the sea;
And with the sea-breeze hand in hand
Came innocence and she.

Where 'mid the gorse the raspberry
Red for the gatherer springs,
Two children did we stray and talk
Wise, idle, childish things.

Oh, there were flowers in Storrington,
On the turf and on the spray;
But the sweetest flower on Sussex hills
Was the daisy flower that day...

* * * * *

She looked a little wistfully,
Then went her sunshine way:—
The sea's eye had a mist on it,
And the leaves fell from the day.

She went her unremembering way,
She went and left in me
The pang of all the partings gone
And partings yet to be."

My Meynell writes with ardour of his friend &

"He made all men his debtors, leaving to those who loved him the memory of a unique personality, and to English poetry an imperishable name."

In last week's Nation, "W. M." wrote to correct the false impression of Francis Thompson given by the following note in The Times:—"There are occasions on which the conventional expression of regret becomes a mockery, and this is one of them. What the world must regret is not the release of Mr. Thompson, but the fact that the cravings of the body from which he is released should have had power to ruin one of the most remarkable and original of the poetic geniuses of our time." "I know," says "W. M." "what the writer insinuates. I know, too, that he has overshot his mark. But the public will only too greedily infer from his words that Thompson was a degraded man, he who carried dignity amid all vicissitude; and that he was a debauchee, he who lived, as he sang, the votary of Fair Love. Nor need I adopt in his regard the fine passage in which Mr. Birrell defends Charles Lamb's 'drinking.' For Mr. Francis Thompson did not 'drink.' The 'genius' of Francis Thompson was not 'ruined,' or we should not have the evidence of it on every page of three volumes, presenting together a body of best poetry equal in size to that of most of our poets. But it is true that Thompson's health was wretched from first to last. It is true also that he doctored himself disastrously with laudanum from almost the early days of his medical studentship in Manchester. When he came to the streets of London, the drug delivered him in a manner from their horrors, and, besides, was, I think, some palliation of the disease of which he finally died—consumption. It is true, also, that Thompson was a man apart. Laudanum made of him an alien, not an outcast. He held aloof from society; knew almost nobody; went nearly nowhere. All this notwithstanding, there are few things more certain to his friends than the sanity of Thompson, or more sacred than his untarnished name."

ON Thursday and Friday next a sale of work will be held at the Central Hall, Seven Kings, on behalf of the fund for erecting a Unitarian Church in the growing town of Ilford (population, 65,000). Services were started about two years ago, and have since been regularly held in the Assembly Room, Broadway. The effort has been so far successful, the need of a suitable building is now felt for religious worship, and for carrying on the various agencies which are essential for the life and development of a modern Christian Church. Lady Bethel, the wife of the local member of Parliament, will open the proceedings on Thursday at 4.15 p.m. The chair will be occupied by Mr. John Harrison. Several friends from the orthodox churches have promised to be present, and it is hoped that members of our own household of faith will also show their personal and practical sympathy with this new movement. Train from Liverpool-street at 3.28, arriving at Seven Kings at 3.59. The Central Hall is close to the station.

THE WATER-STAR.*

AN attractive cover in green cloth, prettily decorated, with a white water-lily in the centre, led us to pick up Mr. Badger's book in Boston, and it has been a pleasure to read its four chapters on the voyage home. The book is altogether one of the happiest of the recent publications of the American Unitarian Association, both as to form and contents, and that is saying a good deal. The four chapters printed in large clear type, on ample pages, with decorated borders, contain matter which has doubtless served as sermons in whole or in part, and with apt use of parables from nature, of which "The Water-Star" is the first, teach true lessons of the higher life. The other three chapters are on "Landscape of the Soul," "The Haunts of the Hind," and "Do we see Nature?"

Mr. Badger is secretary of the Middle States Conference, and many of our friends may have made his acquaintance at the Unitarian headquarters in New York, or in Boston. As a sample of his teaching in this little book, we quote the conclusion of the second of the four chapters:—

"This world is a pretty mean world to live in—for mean souls. No doubt of that. But for souls that have large visions, for souls that know the deep reality of love, duty and sincerity, it is a world crowded to the shreds of common happenings with meanings of divinity. It is a small and unsatisfactory world for him who is shut in, day by day, by the dreary, monotonous walls of life's little but uncompromising actualities. The real to such a man is not peasant. But to the man who can see in divine proportions, through the soul's clear lenses of Conscience, Love, and Verity—to him who knows the realities of life's ideals, every day has ideal beauty for its landscape-setting of divine reality. And to such a soul God is real, for He is the eternal mystery of divine ideal which holds each particle of daily happening in His abiding beauty. He is the Eternal Love, the Eternal Righteousness, the Eternal Truth, we can never get away from. He is the soul's comfort and the soul's restfulness; for He is the soul's Reality of Ideal."

Ghent is fortunate in its "Bureau de Bienfaisance," and especially in Dr. Miele's "Consultations for Nurselings," graphically described in last week's Labour Leader. It appears that of every 1,000 babies born in Ghent from 400 to 500 never reach their fifth year. But under Dr. Miele's care the number of deaths is reduced to 40. He holds two daily "consultations," when his young girl assistants weigh and examine the babies, under his supervision. The girls are also trained in sterilising milk and preparing baby foods, and help in the four crèches connected with the doctor's work. For two years they give their services free, but after that time receive a small salary. Besides personal assistance and advice Dr. Miele gives lantern lectures to the mothers. The work reaches about 1,000 babies each year.

HOPE STREET CHURCH,
LIVERPOOL.

BICENTENARY OF THE CONGREGATION.

THE bicentenary of the congregation of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, was celebrated on Sunday and Monday by special services, and a conversazione at which commemorative addresses were given. The actual date thus commemorated was of the granting on November 24, 1707, of a licence for the building of the first meeting house of the congregation in Kaye-street. The successor to this building was the Paradise-street chapel, opened in 1791, to which James Martineau came in 1832, while he and his congregation in October, 1849, entered upon the present beautiful Hope-street Church.

The Liverpool Daily Post and Mercury, in anticipation of this celebration, published on Friday week a most interesting historical article, telling of the origin of the congregation, and on Sunday, the Rev. H. D. Roberts, the present minister, dwelt with greater fulness on the same subject.

The following list of the ministers of the congregation was printed on the hymn papers:—

The congregation was in existence in the year 1700, and probably before that date.

Edmund Martin Geldart . . . 1873-1876

Charles John Perry . . . 1878-1883

Richard Acland Armstrong . . . 1884-1905

Henry David Roberts . . . 1903-1905-1907

The Sunday services were attended by large congregations, many friends from near and far having come to take part in the commemoration, some old members of the congregation especially having come great distances to be present.

In the morning, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, minister of the sister congregation of Ullet-road Church, took part in the service, when the first hymn, after the opening sentences from Psalm ciii., "Bless the Lord, O my soul," was:

"Now thank we all our God,
With hearts and hands and voices,
Who wondrous things hath done,
In whom the world rejoices."

The first hymn in the evening was I. H. Gill's, "We come unto our fathers' God."

The Rev. H. D. Roberts preached morning and evening. "Comprehension and Catholic Christianity" was the subject of the morning sermon, which dwelt upon the beautiful ideal of religious comprehension cherished by Richard Baxter, and the ministers of that congregation from the first. Mr. Roberts quoted from Christopher Bassnett, the first minister of Kaye-street, and the friend of Matthew Henry, to show how completely he, with his friends, was possessed by that ideal; and yet, said the preacher in conclusion, "the desire for comprehension, with all its attendant charity and tolerance, could not be a permanent position. There must needs grow up from it that passion for freedom of conscience, self-dependent, self-controlling, self-judging, which in fact marks the further history of this congregation. Religious freedom, all the great claims and contentions which were presently to bring forth a Martineau, were even now waiting at the doors. But it is not too much to say that the noble tree of liberty under whose spreading branches we sit in peace to-day had its roots in such men as Richard Baxter, Philip Henry, Matthew Henry, and Christopher Bassnett; and our hearts may well thrill, as looking back on our origins and history after 200 years of strenuous life, we see that they arose from a severe loyalty to ideals, which was ever ready to give up the prizes of a false conformity; which could never rest happy in easy fictions; which, as time went on, was fearlessly to assimilate and proclaim new and emancipating ideas; which was to walk calmly in the van of religious progress where to-morrow the world would pass easily; which was bravely to reject old things worn out and useless, and which was always ready to pay the price for its religion. Truly, ours has been a great history and a noble tradition; and ours also is a great responsibility."

And so, turning to the thought of present duty, the preacher asked, Will those who come after rejoice in us, as we rejoice in our ancestors?

"Will they see us losing sight of great thing in small things; losing sight of great issues in petty egotism? Or will they know that we too, we of the beginning of the twentieth century, were of fearless nature, saying fearless words and doing fearless deeds; that we too, were a religious company, voicing audibly the universal and eternal cry after God; that we, too, were full of that fine disquietude which laid burdens upon us, until we arose and saved; that we, too, were noble men and women, elevated in thought, pure in spirit, dignified and beautiful in life, loyal to the ideals built into every stone of this church?"

"Solemn questions, only to be answered in that dry light of accomplished time, and with that impartial justice which looks upon a complete past. But we pray on this day of our remembrance that, as we and men advance further into the truth, and change in methods of facing life, we may still be worthy of the honourable bequest of our fathers, and by no means fall below our great history and noble traditions. And may God indeed be our strength!"

The evening sermon was on "The Open Religious Way." We trust that the congregation will publish both sermons as a memorial of the day, and we can give here only the concluding sentences. Comprehension, Mr. Roberts said, was only a static condition, but liberty was the dynamic of progress. (We have a word about this in our leader.) And he showed how progressive thought had marked the history of the congregation:—

“So the journey along the Free and Open Way, begun 200 years ago, has continued to this day, when we ourselves, in our brief passage turn our faces to the light. The torch of liberty, tentatively lighted by the meek and reverend pioneers, has glowed brighter with the fervour of the generations. Grasped by John Brekell; handed on from Philip Taylor to John Yates; glowing with a new flame in the hand of John Grundy; held aloft for the world to see in finest purity and intensity by James Martineau; carried bravely and fearlessly till the time of Richard Armstrong; its fire reinforced and diffused by his forceful fervour in many lands; it is for us to keep alight as a holy trust that which our spiritual fathers have kindled. We may not—we do not—think our fathers’ thought. We are of our own day. It is the thought of our time, and the need of our time, which must be fuel to our flame; the great social hungering for fulness of life—of mind, of body, of soul—to which we must respond, if we are faithful. And for freedom—that is not yet. Our fathers fought for it; but the battle is not won. There is still slavery, as hideous as the slavery of the negro which cried out to those forebears of ours. A great possibility lies before us, as it lay before them—the possibility of helping to enfranchise. May the Father of Spirits raise us into such Divine discontent that we shall carry on our great tradition still farther, and so bear the light passed on to us that we also may add to the light of the world.”

THE CONVERSAZIONE.

In further celebration of the bicentenary a conversazione was held on Monday evening in the Yamen Rooms, Bold-street, Liverpool, on the invitation of Sir William and Lady Bowring and Mr. Frederick Robinson (chairman of the Hope-street congregation), and Mrs. Robinson. There was an attendance of between four and five hundred guests, including many members of neighbouring congregations and friends from a distance.

Both before and after the speaking, the Euterpean Ladies Orchestra played selections, and refreshments were served in another room.

Sir WILLIAM BOWRING, in opening the proceedings, offered a very cordial welcome to the members of Hope-street and friends from other churches, and to the ministers and their wives; and then he said:—I am happy that I have lived to see this day—so notable in the history of the church which has been dear so long to my family and myself—this day on which we celebrate the bicentenary of the Hope-street Church congregation. It is a day which, from the nature of things, is unique in our lives. And I am glad that we have been able to mark it by gathering together here this company of the free in religious thought and sympathetic in practical religion. We have unfolded to us in the hospitable columns of the Daily Post and Mercury, as from our own pulpit, some of the earnest and troublous beginnings of our own and the sister congregations. Of those beginnings and of our subsequent history we may well be proud. It is a pride that is quite consistent with humility—though we have occasionally been told that humility is not one of our characteristic virtues. When we think of the men who have made our history, in the line of whose descent we are, spiritual and strenuous men who thought hard and worked hard, and whose thoughts and works we inherit, even though we do do our thinking for ourselves; when we think of them to-night we should be dull and hard indeed if our hearts did not beat a little more quickly at the thought of them. It is not only the ministers whom we remember. It is that long line of congregational life which has always meant something in the history of Liverpool, and in which many of us have deep roots of kinship and affection. The congregations have stood, on the whole, for righteousness and justice. They have not always marched in a solid phalanx to reorganise life on religious principles; for even at Hope-street Church the millennium has not come, and truly we have at times heard, perhaps, millenniums announced from our pulpit which we were not quite ripe for. But we think that the pulpit should be ahead of the pew, should suggest to the pew, or where is the use of the pulpit? Yet, to speak only of my father’s life and my own, many a good work have I seen initiated at Hope-street Church that has made for better citizenship and purer Christianity; and many a good and unselfish life have I seen working itself out. My own recollections, as you know, cover many years of our church life. I remember the opening of our beautiful building in Hope-street; and I may say that never do I remember it more beautiful than it is now. It is through the unselfish and generous efforts of many here that we have been able to redecorate and beautify it in a worthy and fitting manner. And I think all those who have helped must have a peculiar and especial pleasure in looking at the church, and knowing that they have contributed to make it what it is. I am very glad that the ready generosity of our friends had not to be invoked through a bazaar, or a fancy fair, or any of those things. They simply gave immediately and gladly, and the value of their gifts was, in my opinion, thereby enhanced. In speaking of this church I must needs include all our Free Churches, for our history is similar, and our cause one and the same. But for those who name themselves of Hope-street Church, whose bicentenary it is, their deepest feeling must be for that home which has meant so much in their lives. We think of it in loving memory, and we think of it, too, in hope for its future. And, in conclusion, I would quote to you the words of one who long worshipped within those walls—the words of Robert Leighton, whose name is yet amongst us, and I would make those words my own:—

“So, in its beauty has our chapel grown
From Thee, O God! a very poem inspired;
And drinking in its every line and tone,
My heart is never tired.

I love it for the coming hope, though dim.
The old renown still hangs about these walls;

And, ’tis my faith, whoever comes, on him
Elijah’s mantle falls.”

Principal GORDON, who was minister of Hope-street Church with the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, 1863-72, said that in speaking to them that evening he was reminded of a venerable man, who, on an occasion similar to that said: “When I look at the faces that I do not see, I am constrained to address you in words that I cannot utter”; and he recalled what Dr. Martineau said on revisiting Dublin after forty years: “I seem to have got back into my pre-existent state.” Yet he still retained certain memorials of Hope-street, as it was in his day (memorials of which he spoke with characteristic humour), and among them the old gown he purchased forty-five years ago for use in their pulpit. His Hope-street sermons, when he left, he put away in a black box, and there they still were, if the mice had not devoured them. He had lately thought of bringing out a volume of those sermons under the title, “The New Theology.” He still had faithful friends in that congregation, who, every Christmas, sent him cards of remembrance. Of these, Miss Lewin had been one, from whom he received a greeting the very Christmas before her death. He was glad that Mr. Roberts was engaged in researches into their history, and would gather up for them what was of value for future generations. History should not make them turn their faces backwards, but should urge their footsteps forward. Having recalled the memory of some of those who were formerly connected with that congregation—Thomas Avison, whose father and grandfather also were liberal dissenters, and Charles Rawlings and Samuel Bulley, the two who were the fruit of the famous controversy of 1839, and in themselves were proof sufficient that that controversy was not thrown away, Principal Gordon concluded with a parable. He described some aged women, who were lace workers, and who when asked how they obtained light enough through the little windows of the cottage where they worked, said that they each set a round water bottle on the window sill so that the light reflected from the water was concentrated upon the pillow which held their work. So, he said, were they, each one, small reflectors, who received rays of light from the great central Light, and then let it strike right upon their business.

The Rev. PHILIP H. WICKSTEED said that he was grateful that they had asked him to take part in that commemoration. He felt on Sunday and in that meeting, how true it was that their reminiscences had a forward look, and that if ever their church deserved its name of Hope, it deserved it now. He recalled, once more, that saying of Dr. Sadler’s, in gentle rebuke of a younger generation inclined to look back upon the “old fossils” of the past: “We always know that our ancestors are dead, but we do not always realise that they were not dead when they were alive.” He rejoiced in Mr. Roberts’ description of their churches as “churches of the open way.” Could we not, he asked, give up once for all our disputings about names and agree to call ourselves and to be “the Churches of the Open Way”? Liverpool, in that matter, held a place with which none other could compare. It had associations gathered round the names of Thom, Martineau, Beard, and Armstrong, which made it a kind of Mecca for those who cherished that ideal. His own father’s first and last regular ministries were in Liverpool—the first at the Ancient Chapel, the last at Hope-street; and not only to him, but to all the line of the Hope-street ministers, he owed special debts of gratitude, and was drawn to them by special ties. The first and last, before their present minister, refused to separate themselves in his mind, but were associated together in many ways. When he went to college in London, Martineau was not yet Principal, but was professor of philosophy, and the first of the students he met was Richard Armstrong. In those early days Armstrong was not among the most enthusiastic followers of Martineau, for his life and thought ripened slowly, and they would not then have picked him out as the one of their number likely to become the great populariser and exponent of Martineau's philosophy. The other Hope-street ministers, between those two had all their several notes. He had seen how they had touched the lives of men, and all, in one way or another, had touched his own life. Of their next minister, after Martineau, William Henry Channing, he recalled the special note of spirituality. He was called a dreamer, and not unnaturally so, for the lines of his thought were not always realisable; but there was in him a rare intensity of conviction and insight, and there were many to whom his word came as a revelation of the reality of the unseen world, including the deeper and more real side of the things amid which they lived. Life became a new thing to those whose spirit Channing touched. Of his own father, and his broad and genial humanities, he could not speak, except to say that he knew he was constantly making friends. He loved his friends and was loved by them most deeply. He never forgot his friends or was forgotten by them. Then came that wonderful meteoric nature, Martin Geldart, whom he first knew as a "disorbed curate" in Manchester. The greatest ministerial work of Geldart's life was done at Croydon, but thinking of him as the successor of Martineau and precursor of Armstrong, the deeply religious nature of the man, the sacred athlete wrestling with ignorance and prejudice and tyranny, yet a man with no creed to speak of, not believing in any fixed and definite way in the things which Martineau and Armstrong lived to bring into clear focus and impress on the minds of men—he was impressed by the immeasurable depths of the ways of God, how the Spirit bloweth where it listeth. He saw those men, so different, yet in deep essential unity, all ministering to the deeper spiritual life of those who came under their influence. Their next minister, Charles Perry, was especially their own, and had stamped himself upon their hearts. Not that he had not the character and manhood to make himself felt over wider fields, but his too brief life gave him only the opportunity of making his worth and power felt in the narrower circles to which he had access. While Charles Perry was still at college in London, he had the privilege of working with him, and saw in him powers of judgment and firmness of character and tact such as few possessed. He solved problems of co-operation that would have taxed the ripest experience, by his goodness, the absence of any kind of personal self-seeking or self-assertion, his perfect beauty and simplicity of nature. So (said the speaker) he came back to his friend and brother, Richard Armstrong, the companion who was always in his thoughts, without whose influence no great step of progress in his own life had been taken, the greatness of whose work was a constant source of joy and pride to those who were privileged to share his friendship. As he thought of all those men, he did not know where to look for such an inheritance as they had in that church. Great, indeed, was their privilege, and great the privilege they were the means of giving to the world. For the influence of those men had spread far beyond the walls of their own church. If they looked back and tried to find the points on which all these men were one, they would find many of the essentials of the majority not essentials to all. Many of the items in the social and political essentials of Edmund Martin Geldart would not find a place among the essentials of James Martineau. Yet all of them had felt the instant reality of good. There was not one who would not have stood up boldly in answer to the challenge, "Who will show us any good?" Every one of them, in the Hope-street pulpit, had touched and handled and known in his heart and life things worth living for, and things worth dying for. Every one of them had known that there is a life worthy to be lived, that good and goodness are realities. There was not one of them, whatever his philosophy, who did not know that evil was so far a reality, that the world could not be left to drift, that no man might dare to offer his heart and life as a stage on which the conflicting powers and influences should fight it out, but must take sides and be a warrior himself. There was not one of them who had not faith, deep-rooted belief, as deep as anything in his life, that he who fought for the right and attacked evil had the Eternal and Omnipotent on his side, that he himself might fall and be defeated, but his cause must be victorious. There was not one who had not hope, beyond the limit of the warrant of faith, bright visions of what might be, the wreck of which would leave his faith unshaken, yet the vision of which inspired and uplifted; not one who, in whatever depression or struggle, did not believe always and often feel, did not give to them and give to the world, the crowning joy of the Holy Spirit.

The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, in a concluding speech, expressed the hope that that commemoration might deepen their sense of human solidarity, that they of the Open Way might gird up their strength, in unity of spirit, and, in the name of free religion, be its personal exponents. Coming together with their belief in the Fatherhood of God, as brothers indeed, they must see that it was not to them a mere catch-word, but a reality filling their religious life, that they might make that city feel there were those who would band themselves together, because they were free, and see that justice was done to all, that all might be free both before God and in sight of one another, that each citizen might live the free life for which God gave him the full faculty.

The history of the Hope-street congregation, which Mr. Roberts has in preparation, it is hoped may be completed early in the new year, a welcome successor to his history of Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester.

A KNIGHT ERRANT OF THE SOUL.*

To meet and have converse with Thomas Davidson was an experience not easy to forget. The energies of intellect and of feeling were so concentrated in him, and found such freedom and fulness of expression through his whole personality, that to be with him in his best moods was a revelation of things not seen. His physical appearance—ruddy, hirsute, and portly—suggested no such vitality of soul; but his whole being was so dominated by the activities of thought and will that the body of flesh and blood seemed charged to the finger tips with the life of the spirit. I used to think that his strong and exuberant faith in personal immortality, amounting to a kind of certainty of conviction, was sustained, not so much by the intellectual arguments for it (though he held these to be quite unanswerable) as by the tremendous force of this spiritual vitality. He was so vigorous and alert in mind, was such an athlete of intellect and will, that the idea of ceasing to be was not so much repugnant to him as impossible or ridiculous. To suggest to him that the collapse of the bodily powers might mean the cessation of thought and emotion was simply to talk nonsense. He thought he could prove, convincingly, the doctrine of personal immortality for every human being; indeed, his whole philosophy of life involved it. But behind all his arguments lay this indomitable energy of spirit; and he seemed at times like one who defied the universe to set any limit to that. Goethe's Prometheus he greatly delighted in, as expressing the soul's power over its own destiny, and its unconquerable will. He held that life in man was eternal, not in the sense of mere duration, but in that which transcends time and partakes of the nature of God. God is "the ideality of which we are the reality; but if the reality should cease, so likewise would the ideality." "If I can fully realise my eternity in this life, death will be of no consequence to me; indeed, it is of very small consequence to me now. When a man has realised his eternity, flesh and blood are only obstacles to him, to his best efficiency!"

This man, with his passionate enthusiasm for life, and his amazing intellectual equipment, went about the world giving himself away to any who would receive of his spiritual wealth. "The wandering scholar" Prof. Knight calls him. He was the Giordano Bruno of the nineteenth century. Born of humble Scotch parents, left an orphan in early years, he knew as a boy the pinch and the struggle of poverty. At school and college he took in knowledge with the ease and ardour of a born scholar, winning prizes that gave him access to all the learning a Scotch University had to offer. Then he wandered about Europe studying philosophy in Germany and Italy, mastering languages almost without effort. He had a memory which seemed never to lose anything he had once read or heard, and an intellectual grip which enabled him to mobilise and never be obsessed by the vast treasures of knowledge he had acquired. He kept school for a while, but was too restless to settle down to the work of a paid teacher. Declining professorships and College tutoring, he took the world for his parish and went from place to place, gathering about him little groups of learners, giving forth his knowledge and stimulating the minds of young men and women to see truth for themselves, as the supreme necessity of life." "Like Socrates," says Prof. Knight, "he never cared about rewards for instruction. Like Socrates, also, he had 'many scholars, but no school.'"

During the last twenty years of his life he gave himself to the work of a reformer and regenerator of society; but he strove not for political or economic reform. He was very angry with the Socialists, who sought first to improve the external conditions of the masses of the people. He admitted the necessity of such improvement, but held that it was useless to change the conditions until you had changed the inward man, forgetting, in his enthusiasm for things of the spirit, how impossible it is for a man who has always got "the wolf of poverty by the ears" to give much attention to that which pertains to the mind and heart. Yet he had a real sympathy with the suffering and struggling poor, and often gave, from his own scant resources, help to those who were in need. He was possessed by the true reforming spirit, only he insisted on the reform being from within, by the elimination of error and selfishness, and the culture of knowledge and insight and love. Doubtless, amid the many appeals for economic and political change which have made themselves heard in the last quarter of a century the call of Thomas Davidson to seek first the kingdom of God which is within was much needed, and has not been heard in vain.

In these "Memorials" Professor Knight gives a very interesting account of Davidson's efforts in the formation of a "Fellowship of the New Life," both in London and in New York, quoting the words of some who were intimately associated with those efforts—Percival Chubb, Maurice Adams, Havelock Ellis and others. It is a significant fact, as showing Davidson's influence on different types of mind, that not only the New Fellowship, which laid the emphasis on inwardness and character as of supreme moment, but the Fabian Society, which concerned itself with economics and politics, sprang out of meetings which he called together in London. It is significant, too, that during the later years of his life, he not only held his "Summer School of Culture Sciences" among the Adirondack Hills, but gave his winter months to work among the struggling poor of New York city. "Here he gathered about him, in peculiarly close bonds, a body of young Russian Hebrews, whom he endeavoured to help to get culture in the broadest, manliest sense of the term." He told a friend that "the whole of his long life had been a preparation for this." One who knew much about this work, and took up some of it after Davidson's death, speaks of "the powerful, transforming, personal influence exerted over these young boys and girls by a man who could show in such relationships a magnetic charm, a sympathy and tenderness of interest, a whole-souled devotion which will undoubtedly have left a deep mark upon many lives." (p. 31.)

Prof. Knight's volume does not claim to be a biography, does not attempt to give a full and final estimate of the extraordinary personality of the man. But it gives us much which those who knew him are glad to have recorded, and which those who knew him not will read with a surprised joy. Some statements in the book having reference to his attitude towards socialism and individualism may seem a little confused, and the account of his philosophic faith is not all that could be wished. But the versatility of the man, the many-sidedness of his character, the changeful lights and shadows which played around his wandering life render it difficult to place him or give any clear and faithful presentment of his social or metaphysical creed. God, Freedom, and Immortality are the great watchwords of his philosophy; and what these meant to him may, in some degree, be gathered from two papers of his, given at the close of this volume, on "Intellectual Piety," and "Faith as a Faculty of the Human Mind." In the last-mentioned his doctrine of the freedom of the will struggles for expression in language of extraordinary boldness. "A man," he says, "is not actually free until he frees himself." "He cannot choose until he does choose; it is in the very act of choosing that he becomes free to choose." Most men, he seemed to think, had not yet attained to this, but all were destined to attain, here or elsewhere. Indeed, his optimism was of the most uncompromising type. The powers of intellect and love, in each of us, were practically unlimited, and in the exercise of them we are all to reach perfection in the perfect life of God.

He died in the autumn of 1900, at the age of sixty, in his mountain retreat among the Adirondacks. The closing words of Felix Adler's address, when his friends were gathered there to bid farewell to the earthly part of him, may fitly end this notice of a book for which all who knew him will be grateful. "He loved his Glenmore, and it is fitting that here at Glenmore the earthly part of him should find its rest. The eternal procession of the stars will pass nightly over his silent grave; the storms of winter will sweep over this plateau; and the snow, doubtless, will drift and heap itself high above this mound; then the spring will come and cover it again with verdure and flowers. The seasons will come, the seasons will go, but he who once was the life of this place, emanating life, will appear amongst us no more. Yet in no sense can we think of him as wholly vanished. He himself believed strenuously that man is 'an eternal being with an infinite task.' And the thought of immortality seems to have been as certain to him almost as existence itself; but even from us who survive him he cannot wholly vanish. He has sown thought seeds that will flourish in many hearts. He has helped to shape lives that will never entirely lose the nobler imprint he has given them. He has kindled the torch of ideals that will never wholly be extinguished.

THE SOUL OF PROGRESS.*

THIS volume consists of seven lectures delivered in St. Paul's Cathedral, Melbourne, by the Bishop of Tasmania. The lectures have special interest as being the first series given under the auspices of a lectureship trust recently established in memory of the Australian episcopate of the Right Rev. James Moorhouse, D.D., who was Bishop of Melbourne, 1876 to 1886. By the conditions of the trust, the lecturer may be "Any one in Holy Orders in the Church of England at home or abroad, or in a church in communion with her." The lectures will always be published, and so we may now look annually to this source for pronouncements of leading Anglicans and others with regard to questions bearing upon the fundamentals of Religion, and of the Christian faith in particular. Bishop Mercer has struck the right note at the outset. He has taken up large problems, and he has taken them up in a large spirit. He shows himself to be a lucid thinker and writer, and, what is much more, a scholar who strives to study his subject widely and deeply and without bias.

The matter of his lectures on the Soul of Progress falls into two main divisions. The theme of the first section is the interpretation of the Universe, and of the second the relation of the individual to the social whole. The first theme necessarily opens up the materialistic controversy, on which so much is just now being written. Bishop Mercer confesses himself to be an Idealist, and, that being so, we know in advance along what philosophical line he will move to the attack of the materialistic hypothesis. In this connection he says nothing that is new, but he has done what has rarely been done in so masterly a manner. He has given an exposition of the underlying conceptions of philosophical Idealism, in such a way that their cogency can be readily grasped by any thoughtful mind. He forces the thinker back to the position that consciousness is the primary self-dependent fact from which all fruitful search for Truth must start. All the functions of consciousness have value for the perception of Truth. The interpretations of the Universe that proceed from a purely scientific basis—i.e., from the observation of objects of sense and inferences drawn from them—are erroneous, because they proceed from a partial functioning of the mind. "A heartless thinking machine" could not know Truth, because whole spheres of reality would lie beyond its perception. Such, though in the form of a man, could "recognise no distinction between good and bad, just and unjust, beautiful and ugly, sublime and insignificant." Thus emerges the fact on which all else in the lecturer's philosophy depends, that our experience of values, and our value of judgments, have an incontrovertible function in disclosing the world of reality.

Reality embraces the scientifically known world and its forces, and also the scientifically unknown world of the ideal—a world known to us because we are not "scientists" only. This thought is then further worked out and leads on to the establishment of the position that the movement in the universe is not to be explained simply from prior observable facts. The "push" from behind is never all. There is the "pull" from the ideal. This comes into consciousness in the case of man, and consequently man is conscious that his action is never the simple outcome of antecedent or external forces. The ideal draws him, exerting an added power. And thus he awakens to Purpose controlling his life and lying in the heart of the Universe.

The second part of Bishop Mercer's subject is the elucidation of this "Purpose," that makes itself manifest in the world and pre-eminently in human life. At the threshold lies the question of Free Will. He who believes in a controlling purpose has always certain predilections for determinism. Bishop Mercer certainly has, but his sense of moral responsibility makes "free will" an equal necessity to him. He has sought, therefore, to reconcile the two rival theories in a theory of self-determination. The subject is too large to enter into here. Suffice it to indicate that the view expounded is a modified form of that so well known in connection with the name of T. H. Green.

The purpose towards which the individual strains is self-realisation. His whole action in this world is the unfolding of an innate "will to live." And now a new and all-important fact comes into view. Against John Stuart Mill, the lecturer contends that there is no such being as an "individual man." An individual is what he is in virtue of being a part of a social whole. The doctrine thus advances, that self-realisation can only be attained through the service of the social whole. But is the interest of the individual always and absolutely coincident with the interest of society? On this rock many a theorist has come to grief. The Bishop sees clearly that it cannot be proved if the individual life is limited to its short earthly career. But he holds that it can if the individual be immortal.

The lectures culminate in the following conviction. "I define the goal of progress to be self-realisation on the part of beings who are members of a spiritual society. The soul of progress I declare to be the Ideal."

It is possible to give here but a meagre glimpse at the main drift of the book. Its message is, on the whole, wonderfully thought-satisfying and thought-stimulating. There is not a dry page in it. If anyone beginning it does not read it through eagerly, it will be a sad reflection not on the author but on himself.

J. W. A.

THE principle is, that God is the ungrudging bestower of blessings, and that men are His stewards to distribute these blessings. So far as they enter into His mind, the delight will be in spreading abroad, not in accumulating. Their reward will be a continually growing knowledge of His character and purpose. Their treasure will be in whatever things are good, pure, true; their heart will be occupied with these.—F. D. Maurice.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

ENGLISH ARTISTS: III.—STOTHARD.

THOMAS STOTHARD, the next artist I want to tell you about, was born a few years later than Reynolds and Gainsborough, but his pictures are much less well known. Though he was not one of our greatest painters, his work is of very real interest, as he was one of the first and greatest of book illustrators. He illustrated Homer, Shakespeare, Milton, and our other great poets; Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Robinson Crusoe, and many books of his own day, besides making designs for almanacks, magazines, and children's spelling books. When he died he left about five thousand illustrations, many of which are now in the British Museum.

Stothard was born in 1755 and lived till 1834, and the whole of his life he was untiring in his industry, studying every form of art which he considered might be useful to him in his work, and making accurate drawings of all objects that attracted his attention.

Stothard's parents lived in London, the father being an inn-keeper, though coming of an old and respectable family. Thomas, the only child, was so delicate in health that at five years old he was sent to live in Yorkshire, and was placed under the care of an old lady, who kept a small day school. He was a quiet, gentle boy, and the old lady became exceedingly fond of him and was glad to give him any little extra pleasure which lay in her power. "Little Tommy," as she called him, remembered in later life having a choice of two treats offered him from time to time, one being the company of a boy of whom he was very fond, the other (a strange treat it would seem to a little boy in our day, but the one he most often chose) admission to a certain store-room, where hung an old picture, before which he was content to sit alone until he was called to supper and to bed.

Before he was eight years of age he had tried to copy portions of engravings which belonged to the same old lady, and he further relates of himself that his father was pleased with his efforts to draw and sent him a box of colours, but he did not know how to use them and painted his first man black!

The father died when Stothard was only fourteen or fifteen, and the mother, thinking it best to put him into work where his evident fondness for drawing might be turned to account, apprenticed him to a man whose trade was to make designs for brocaded silks, which were then much in request for dresses. All through the years of his apprenticeship Stothard worked hard, winning the love of the master and his wife by his steady conduct and sweet disposition. He spent every leisure hour in trying to educate himself by reading Homer, Spenser, or any good literature that he could obtain, and in the evenings he made designs in illustration of what he had read, according to his fancy.

It was not until 1780 that he obtained regular employment on the Novelist's Magazine, through his drawings having been noticed by the editor, when the latter was calling on the brocade designer. From this time he did a great deal of work as a book illustrator, and it was chiefly owing to his marvellous gift of imagination, combined with the editor's influence, that beautiful illustrations were introduced as an ornament to English literature.

There are not many of his pictures in the National Gallery, but the few we have are well worth studying. The best known is "The Pilgrimage to Canterbury," painted in illustration of Chaucer's Tales. The pilgrims to Beckett's shrine, who are all mounted and travelling in company, beguile their way by telling stories; they form a procession which, but for Stothard's skill, would be stiff and formal, but the artist has arranged the small, daintily costumed figures and the horses so cleverly that the line is broken up, whilst the effect is still that of a band of horsemen going along the road in order. The procession is coming from Southwark, and passing through fields which are now the region of Dulwich and Peckham, and in the background the Surrey hills are seen. The varied expressions on the faces, some being grave, and others full of humour, and the clear bright colours in this painting all add to its charm.

In one of the small rooms of the National Gallery are designs for the "Pilgrimage," which show the care and delicacy of finish with which Stothard made even his first, or so-called "rough" sketches for a painting.

"Cupids preparing for the Chase" is a small picture, but a most fascinating one. Three beautifully drawn children form a group in the foreground, whilst away in the distance a city on a hill can just be distinguished. One sturdy little cupid holds a spear, a second vigorously blows his horn, and the third, a curly-headed boy, clings with both arms to the neck of the dog, who is evidently to accompany the hunting expedition.

In Stothard's "Greek Vintage" the drawing is not quite so good, perhaps, as in some of the smaller designs, but the figures of the men and maidens who are carrying baskets of grapes are exquisitely graceful, and the fair child in the centre of the group and the rich colouring of the whole make it a very attractive painting.

Fra Angelico, the saintly painter of the Italian Renaissance, is said to have lived in a world of dreams, as he created his lovely frescoes in the quiet Convent of San Marco, and to have been incapable of harbouring unkind thoughts, or of speaking harsh words to his fellow monks. Thomas Stothard, living in London in the 18th century, has been called the "Fra Angelico of England," because of the sweetness and purity of his mind and of his painting.

He too lived very much in a world of dreams, designing the lovely and refined creatures of his fancy, and believing in the goodness of men because of his own guileless nature.

His pictures may well be called the work of a noble mind; and especially beautiful are his illustrations for "The Pilgrim's Progress," which have been spoken of as "belonging to the highest order of sacred art—images of holiness, of purity, and of childlike innocence, worthy of that immortal poem."

CHURCHES OF THE OPEN WAY.

THE celebration of the Bicentenary of the congregation of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, reported in our present issue, brings us into close touch with the making of a great tradition in the progressive life of our churches; and we are glad to know that this will have more permanent commemoration in the history of the congregation on which its minister, the Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, is engaged. Liverpool, as the Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED said at the soiree on Monday evening, rejoices in a record with which none other can compare, when we remember what the names of MARTINEAU, THOM, BEARD, and ARMSTRONG signify in the history of our churches and in the community where so great a part of their lives was spent; and the whole history of the Liverpool churches, from the first days of Nonconformity, is of peculiar interest, and furnishes one of the finest examples both of the broad progressive spirit, and of the steadfast loyalty to truth, from which we gain so much of the inspiration of our best life.

The main lines of the history were sketched in an article which appeared on Friday week in the Liverpool Daily Post and Mercury, and Mr. ROBERTS, in his two sermons on Sunday, on "Comprehension and Catholic Christianity" and "The Open Religious Way," set the matter still more fully before his people.

The Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, which was a Puritan place of worship throughout the greater part of the seventeenth century, even before the days of the Ejected and of Nonconformity, holds the first place in that history, and it seems that CHRISTOPHER RICHARDSON, one of its early ministers among the Nonconforming, preached also in Liverpool proper, as the first minister of the congregation which worshipped successively in the Castle Hey, Benn's Garden, and Renshaw-street Chapels, and now in Ullet-road Church. The second Liverpool congregation, now worshipping in Hope-street Church, began some years later; but, as Mr. ROBERTS points out, probably before the building of the Kaye-street Chapel, the licensing of which gave the date for the present bicentenary. On Kaye-street followed the Paradise-street Chapel, which had JAMES MARTINEAU for minister when the transition to Hope-street Church was made in 1849. The fuller history, which Mr. ROBERTS is to publish, will be awaited with keen interest. He suggests that the origin of his congregation was to some extent, at least, in a movement for greater freedom and a broader spirit than was to be found originally at Castle Hey, and that only under the ministry of Dr. HENRY WINDER did the senior congregation come into line with its more progressive comrade. We have only to recall the fact that since then Benn's Garden had WILLIAM ENFIELD for minister, and Renshaw-street had THOM and BEARD and JACKS, to show how completely the transforming of the broader spirit was effected.

Mr. ROBERTS showed on Sunday morning how the beautiful ideal of religious comprehension ruled in the minds and hearts of the founders of his congregation, as it did in much later days in the greatest of its ministers. CHRISTOPHER BASSNETT, the first minister of Kaye-street, was the close friend of MATTHEW HENRY, of Chester, and they both rejoiced in that ideal. In illustration of this, Mr. ROBERTS quoted sayings of MATTHEW HENRY'S: "We heartily love and honour all good men and good ministers, however in the less weighty matters of the law we differ from them in sentiment and apprehension, and practise accordingly; and we highly value all who cast out devils in CHRIST'S name, though they follow not with us." "Parties may be served by fury and violence; but the common interest of pure Christianity will certainly be prejudiced by it." Of a friend of his, the head of an academy for the training of ministers, he spoke as one "whose aim was to make his pupils men of sense and catholic Christians," while his own desire was "to join with those whose constitution leaves room for a catholic and comprehensive charity."

That was the spirit in which CHRISTOPHER BASSNETT also entered upon his ministry, and it has been from that time to this the prevailing spirit of the congregation.

But while Comprehension is a beautiful ideal, Mr. ROBERTS affirmed in his evening sermon that it did not suffice, and had not sufficed for the life of that congregation. "Our fathers of this church," he said, "found, and were forced to find, a better way." "It is liberty, freedom, which is the real dynamic of progress." And he gave a very moving exposition of the manner by which, through the "Open Religious Way," they had advanced in their conceptions of religious truth and their apprehension of religious duty, and were now ready, in so far as they were true to that ideal, to meet the new demands of the open future.

Is it, however, the fact that freedom, any more than comprehension, is the real dynamic of progress? And does the transition from the ideal of comprehension to that of freedom mark historically a step of progress in the life of the congregation? The matter appears to us in a different light.

Many of the founders of our Free Churches did undoubtedly cherish the ideal of comprehension, and hoped at first to be able to return into the fold of the National Church, but it was from the first on the condition that there should be freedom of conscience. They went out from the Church because to them freedom to hold the truth and to worship according to the dictates of their own conscience was more vital than inclusion. They gained their freedom at a great price, and became the founders of our "Churches of the Open Way." At the same time that freedom of the spirit is not antagonistic, but prepares the way for a more perfectly inclusive catholic religious fellowship, not on the basis of doctrines which must divide, but on the basis of religious sympathy and service. Nor does it seem to us true to say that freedom is the real dynamic of progress. It is the essential condition of true progress in religious thought and life, but the dynamic, the moving power is surely the hunger after righteousness and more perfect apprehension of the truth, which under conditions of freedom alone has room to grow. There might be perfect freedom in the Church, and yet no impulse of progressive life, so that freedom might be, quite as much as comprehension, a static condition. But where there is the passion of righteousness and brotherhood, impelling towards the more perfect doing of the FATHER'S will, there, as Mr. ROBERTS so finely said at the end of his sermon, is the impulse from which the church must grow into greater fulness of life and go forward to more perfect service. Then also will the truth be more perfectly known.

Therefore we rejoice as we do in our inheritance of freedom and in the fellowship of our Churches of the Open Way.

It is not what the best men do, but what they are, that constitutes their truest benefaction to their fellow-men. Certainly, in our own little sphere, it is not the most active people to whom we owe the most. Among the common people whom we know, it is not necessarily those who are busiest, not those who, meteor-like, are ever on the rush after some visible change and work. It is the lives like the stars, which simply pour down on us the calm light of their bright and faithful being, up to which we look, and out of which we gather the deepest calm and courage.—Phillips Brooks.

"Out of the depths have I cried unto Thee, O Lord. Lord, hear my voice. O Israel, hope in the Lord; for with the Lord there is mercy, and plenteous redemption."—Psalm cxxx. 1, 2, 7.

III.

THE DIVINE ANSWER TO THE CRY OUT OF THE DEPTHS.

Is there any divine response to the call of humanity for God, to these many and varied cries out of the depths of our human being and life? There must be in the nature of things, we are persuaded, such a response, something outside of man answering to his inner life and fulfilling its needs, actual movement and manifestation on the part of God corresponding to our natural cravings after Him. Out of the depths man cries: down to the depths God must come, meeting with a corresponding answer every real and deep want of the souls He has made to seek after Him, if haply they may feel after Him and find Him. Whatever may be the relations between human aspiration and divine condescension, whatever be the conditions of the coming down of the heavenly help to human need, it is simply impossible for any religious soul to think that there is no approach of God to man. Unless life be a tremendous unreality and illusion, and we come into the world only to be fooled and cheated; unless the universe departs from its order in dealing with the spiritual necessities of mankind and the cry for God meets with exceptional treatment, quite unlike that given to the other functions and attitudes of our nature,—it is simply inconceivable that the fundamental cravings of the soul can exist without their satisfaction and the prayer from the depths remain unanswered. Many of our religious teachers may say too much on this matter and speak presumptuously of what God has done and can do, but their overstatements to those who are living in the consciousness and communion of God are better and nearer the truth than denials and negations. It is, indeed, not difficult to believe in divine condescension in an answering, revealing, redeeming God, when one truly believes in God, believes, that is, in infinite and eternal goodness. It appears inevitable that man should look with longing and hope for help from on high,—for he cannot understand his life, its whence and why and whither apart from God. It cannot be, he is sure, having no choice of existence, that he should be here in this world endowed with a mysterious nature, called to live a life full of most serious significance, without the presence and help of God. He has a right, he feels, to trust Him from whom he comes, and to believe that no light from heaven can lead astray, least of all those great religious aspirations and wants which have lived through all human ages, over-reaching all stretches of history, and are still the highest necessities of the soul. No strong crying and tears will make God answer our selfish or fictitious wants;

but that He is responsive to what is best in man, that He is answering day after day, age after age, the spiritual aspirations and needs of humanity, is a necessary belief to everyone, Christian or non-Christian, who believes in the reality and closeness of the bond between God and man, in the affinity of man for that life in God which is the true end of his being.

"O Israel, hope in the Lord; for, with the Lord there is mercy and plenteous redemption." "He is mindful of His own; He remembers His children." The movement cannot be all on the side of man. Job had caught a glimpse of an eternal truth of life when he rested his hope of vindication and deliverance upon the desire which his Maker had toward the work of His hands. That the desire of God has brooded over humanity from the beginning, and still broods over the life of the children of men, is a thought which holds a central place in the literature of religion; and, however difficult it may be to reconcile this lovely, human way of thinking of God with our abstract conceptions of Deity, it brings us closer, we feel sure, to the divine reality of things, than ways which we may fancy to be grander and more philosophical. We are fond of contrasting the littleness of man and the awful brevity of his days upon this earth with the immeasurable creation which science reveals; but, if God be love, then our passionate human life must be more to Him than a whole universe of passionless worlds. What answer can masses of clay and stone, however huge and old, give to the desire of His heart? Can we frame any worthy thought of God which excludes the idea of His need of the love and trust and obedience of His children? If the word "Father" spells but one syllable of the divine name, then we may speak not only of man's need of God, but reverently of God's need of man—of divine love that seeks the answering love of its sons and daughters, of Deity ever going forth out of the abyssal depths of His perfection to give Himself to His creation and His children because it is His nature and property so to do.

It is told of Pascal that often he seemed to hear God saying to him "Thou couldst not seek Me hadst thou not already found Me." Yes! we seek God because He has first sought us and found us. The cry out of the depths is more, therefore, than a mere human breathing—it is itself a divine inspiration. Our pure unselfish longings for truth and goodness, our prayers for union with God are, as Saint Paul taught long ago, the spirit making intercession for us,—that highest human voice which is ever one with the divine voice, which is the divine voice rising from the depths of our humanity and speaking through our spiritual needs. In the movements of the human spirit we see the workings of the divine spirit. It is the divine love of goodness that cries out in us when conscience bears witness for good. It is the divine hatred of evil that cries out in us when conscience awakes in protest against evil. It is because we are made in the moral image of God and are united to Him, not by baptism or conversion, but by birth, that our whole nature thrills with what moves the divine nature. In its last analysis there can be no noble aspiration in man which is not an impulse from Him in whom we live and move and have our being. In the realm of our inner life God does not begin His work where we leave off. It is not man down here and God up there with a vast stretch of distance between. In all the experiences of our life and growth He is present, mingling His life with ours silently and potently. Not here and there, not now and then, but always and everywhere He is near, acting upon the human spirit from within as well as from without, immediately as well as mediately, speaking down to and up from the depths of the heart and conscience—deep answering to deep.

We interpret, and rightly interpret, the various religions of mankind as man seeking God; but they may also be regarded, and rightly regarded, as God seeking man. "Unaided reason," men have been in the way of exclaiming, as they contemplated the various religious systems of the world outside the Hebrew and the Christian religions. But we may well ask, with Cardinal Newman, whether the reason of man is ever unaided? There are not two kinds of religion—natural and revealed. From the point of view of human capacity and seeking and effort all religion is natural: from the point of view of divine manifestation all religion is revealed. The Logos doctrine of the Fourth Gospel, whatever else it teaches, teaches the divine activity in our world from the beginning. It would be an error to suppose that God neglected the larger part of mankind because of His more intimate dealings with one section of the human race. It must be true, if God be one and His name one, that men of like passions and needs as ourselves, who come from God and belong to God, and are nourished physically by His air and sunshine and fruits of the earth, must also have provision made in the divine order of things for the sustenance of their spiritual life, and that it is not left entirely to the tender mercies of their fellows whether they shall have God or be without God in the world. It must be true that God cares equally for the souls of all His children, and that he finds access to them, helps them, teaches them, comforts them, saves them by methods and means that are not seen and temporal, and by ways in which no man can tell whence He cometh and whither He goeth, and that He is only limited in the giving of Himself to them by their capacity to respond and receive. People of old used to think that the divine action was confined to here and there, now and then; but the conviction is growing and spreading that the only defensible conception of the moral action of God on humanity is that of a continuous and impartial influence limited to no age or race. To our enlightened feeling it is becoming more and more presumptuous to say that His spirit can only work along one line of human thought, or can only bring men to Himself through one set of defined successions of emotion or experience. Personal intimacy with God is not an experience special to Jews or Christians. The knowledge of the revelation of God in Hebrew and Christian history is an unspeakable blessing, but those whom, in the order of Providence, it never reaches, are not thereby excluded from the communion of the spirit. A truer and larger faith in God as the everlasting Father and

* The Sermon preached in Arlington-street Church, Boston, Mass., at the International Congress of Religious Liberals, Tuesday evening, Sept. 24.

Teacher and Saviour of mankind has made it no longer possible for intelligent and believing men to regard all religions outside the Jewish and Christian pale as superstition and falsehood, or to keep up the old pitying and condescending attitude towards them. Their immaturities and corruptions we no longer allow to cheat us of the right to say: God is good to all; whither shall we go from His spirit? He has never left Himself without a witness, never left multitudes of His creatures without His help, without light and guidance, without comfort and salvation.

"The Unseen Power, whose eye
Forever doth accompany mankind,
Hath looked on no religion scornfully
That man did ever find.

Which has not taught weak wills how much they can?

Which has not fallen on the dry heart like rain?

Which has not cried to sunk, self-weary man,

Thou must be born again!"

The deep needs of the soul which make man look longingly for help from above and beyond himself, even from God, may be interpreted as a cry for knowledge of Him with whom he has to do, a cry for reconciliation or union with Him, a cry for light and guidance, a cry for strength and consolation and peace. The divine response to this vast and varied cry of humanity has been made, we believe, in some degree, to the whole race of mankind.

"Tell me, I pray thee, Thy name," is a cry out of the depths which man has raised to God in every land and age. It is as natural as it is vital. To know the character of the Unseen Power that orders our birth and death and all our life, and what His relation and attitude are to those whom He made to seek after Him, is a craving which every human being exercising normal powers must at times feel and express. And in some way and in some measure God has been answering this cry, been revealing Himself to man through all the ages of man's life here upon this earth. Revelation has been slow and gradual, not because of any divine reluctance or caprice, but because it waits upon human development, upon the quickening and unfolding of man's highest powers. In troubled and bewildered hours man has been heard complaining, "Verily thou art a God that hidest Thyself;" and yet the light has ever come as fast as he could bear it and receive it. There is no want of revelation. There is, indeed, nothing but revelation. From the beginning God has been revealing Himself to men by the order and beauty and bounty of the world, through the natural affections, by the teaching and learning of life and the education of history. Knowledge of nature and man is knowledge of God. In finding order, harmony, bounty, beauty, truth, wisdom, justice, goodness, and love, God is found. It is all revelation from nature to man and from man to highest man. God has ever been actively present in the world, and especially in man and in the upward movements of his intellectual and moral life. We dare not pretend to limit the ways by which He makes known His personality and His presence, and moves, illuminates, and guides His children. He draws nigh to them, not only in and through His creation and the course of history, not only through the teaching and example of His great prophets, holy servants, and beloved sons, but immediately—mind with mind, spirit with spirit. In all ages men have had experience of an immediate presence—of a God who has access to their inmost being and acts in their secret life, who reveals Himself by impressions upon their spirits, and whose voice, when they are hushed to listen, is heard, not in their ears, but in their souls.

Yes! God is ever coming down into our life—coming more and more. His Advent is unceasing; new light from the Eternal source of light is ever flowing into human souls. What is needed is not more activity of manifestation on the part of God, but more susceptibility to the Divine manifestation on our part—souls which have been taken pains with for the sake of the unseen and spiritual and been made sensitive to God.

The cry of our humanity for reconciliation and union with God is also a cry which God is ever answering. The great obstacle to religion in our world is not ignorance, but sin. More than enlightenment, we need salvation. Can all our civilisation minister to a troubled conscience? Can all our culture heal a guilty pang? Can the knowledge of any scientific, philosophical, or theological truth subdue an evil passion? But in the depths of our weakness and sin God is our salvation. The deliverance of man is dear to God. It is the essential nature of love to seek and to save. Because God is love He is ever coming down to the depths of our life, depths of sorrow and sin, the deepest depths of degradation in order to help and to bring to Himself by all the power of His love His wayward and disobedient children. Whether it be a fallen or a rising world we live in, we know in our hearts that we need reconciliation with the God of the world: blessed be His eternal love! He has never been outside His world, but has been always in it bearing the sins and carrying the sorrows of our race. Its history is the history of redemption, the history of the unceasing efforts of Him with whom we have to do, to influence without compelling the vagrant and stubborn wills of men. Through all the human ages, ever since sin began to darken the face of the world, the seeking and saving love of God has been a reality. All the great attitudes and acts of God are eternal. "That which was from the beginning declare we unto you." "His goings forth have been of old and from everlasting." It was not a new and strange work which the Beloved Son of God did in our world. His work is not an isolated divine effort, an interpolation in human history, but the reflection and revelation in a part of space and time of the universal and eternal labour and passion and sacrifice of God. Without Jesus the world was for thousands of years, but not without a God delighting to forgive and mighty to save. The work of Christ is based on the deeper and larger fact of the love and mercy and care of the Eternal toward all mankind. We are learning its deepest lesson when we see in it a picture of what God is always doing: always helping

His children, always saving them in His infinite goodness and mercy. And as it was then, it is now and ever shall be, world without end.

And not only through Christ and men inspired with the spirit of his life and the charity of his cross does God reconcile the world to Himself; but the whole economy of things is so ordered as to bring men at every point into contact with God. Unto nature and unto all the forces which enter into human life have been committed the ministry of reconciliation. This is their final meaning and end as far as man is concerned. By all the natural processes and experiences of life, by the discipline of toil and hardship, joy and sorrow, by the retribution which warns us back to the ways of righteousness and peace and the moral purpose that is in all events, God our Father from the beginning has been reducing and destroying the moral separation between Himself and His children and been seeking to bring them to the obedience and fellowship of sons.

But here again the work of God on man is more within than without. Immanent in men, He co-operates with the aspiration and effort of every man toward reconciliation with goodness, and therefore with the universal movement of the race. He is the ultimate cause of all progress and the unseen source and inspiration of all our human strivings to draw near to Him. We seek Him because He first seeks us. And the meeting place is often in the lowest depths, where we are struggling with weakness and sin or are sinking under them. At the point where sin leaves us in the darkness of shame and despair God in His mercy finds us and is nigh to help and save.

The most central truth of our religion is just the helpfulness, the universal and eternal helpfulness of God. This is the heart of the religion of the Hebrew poets and prophets. "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in Me is thy help." "In God is my salvation and my glory, the rock of my strength and my refuge is in God." This, also, when we put aside all those strange accretions which have gathered about it in its passage through the thoughts of men, is the message of Jesus Christ, to whom God was: the eternal shepherd of souls, who seeks until He finds. It is the message which the Church has been repeating age after age, clearly or faintly, in differing and often confusing phrase: God is with us—with us in the deepest depths, with us in our greatest humiliations, with us in our bitterest shames, with us in our terriblest sorrow, with us to forgive and save, to strengthen and comfort. It is the glory of Jesus Christ that to-day, as yesterday, he inspires men who come directly under his influence with this enthusiasm of faith in the redeeming mercy and love of the Eternal. To those of us who have been born in Christendom the hope of the old Hebrew saint in plenteous mercy and redemption, in infinite resources of saving love and power in the divine nature, is ours more than ever. The gospel of him who sounded the depths of human sorrow and sin, who descended to hell in another and truer sense than is meant in the creed, who went down into the depths of the world's evil and felt its power—his gospel is a gospel of hope. What is emphatically his secret is the new and greater trust and hope in God which he implanted in the minds and hearts of men. His most central thought concerning human suffering is that it is joy in the making. His most central thought concerning abounding sin is more abounding grace,—infinite possibilities of moral recovery and repair. Men and women! haunted and persecuted by sleepless memories of passion and failure and shame, you have no right to despair of yourselves, for that is to doubt God. His love is deeper than all the depths of moral evil into which you can sink. The hope of salvation to the uttermost has ever come to men through the experience of real and intimate fellowship with God. In all lands and ages the men who have stood nearest God have believed most grandly in His infinite charity and grace. Through him who said that he was one with the Father has been preached unto the world the forgiveness of sins. Because God is love, holy and inexorable love, he must be for ever and ever a God who forgiveth sin—the infinite giver of a power that makes men better, filling them with new tempers, new affections, new loyalties, through which the weak become strong and the bad good—the infinite giver of a power which takes away sin in the only sense sin can ever be taken away, by making the sinner hate his sin, turn against it and away from it, and love and follow the good.

In recent days we have heard much, perhaps too much, of "Old Theology" and "New Theology." What is described as the Old Theology made much of the sense of sin and the need of forgiveness. It regarded human nature chiefly under the aspect of sinfulness and guilt. It forgot that human nature is not a simple and single thing, and that a gospel to commend itself to all men must be wide as human need. Its marvellous strength in the days when it was heartily accepted and believed grew out of its limitations, but these also were the cause of its weakness and its decay. It provoked a reaction from which we are at present suffering. Our liberal theology is too often just as partial and one-sided; failing to meet the needs with which the old orthodox presentation of religion chiefly dealt. A well-meaning religious teacher was speaking on the beauty of goodness to a gathering of poor people in the slums of a great city. "Your rope isn't long enough for the likes of us," shouted one of his hearers. Now, it is not wisdom to think that we have touched bottom because our plummet has ceased going down. It may only mean that the soul and life are too deep for our soundings. What is described as "New Theology," must have much of the Old Theology in it to enrich and complete it, if it is to satisfy in any real and abiding way the spiritual needs of men. Sin and forgiveness, reconciliation and union with God, must not hold in it a secondary place. Its preachers must have the historic sense, and come not to destroy but to fulfil. The thought of the immanent God which has become so real and vivid in our time that it seems to many like a new revelation, does not, wisely understood, lessen our faith in the ever-revealing and ever-redeeming God. But it is required of religious teachers who would meet the deepest cravings of humanity, not only to believe in the Divine Immanence, but to have some personal experience of God's present help and salvation. Saint Augustine tells us that his chief reason for writing his imperishable confessions was to praise God before men for raising him from such depths of sin "lest any other might lie down and sleep in despair and say, 'I cannot awake.'" It is still preachers who can tell men from their own experience of the love and mercy and grace of God whom our world most needs. Of all men, the preacher must not be weak in faith; he must be no doubter, no cynic, no pessimist. He must be a great believer in the great things, also an unconquerable optimist, a man of abounding hopefulness; for he lives to inspire and diffuse hope, to make men feel and believe that they live in a world, not under God's wrath and curse, but under His love and blessing, and that neither life nor death, nor things present nor things to come, will be able to separate them from the Eternal Charity and Care.

When the saintly Quaker, John Woolman, lay on his death-bed, the feeling, he said, "of the extent of the sin and misery of my fellow-creatures separated me from the Divine Harmony, and was more than I could bear. But, in the depths of my distress, I remembered that Thou, O Lord, art omnipotent, and that I had called thee Father; and again I was made quiet in Thy will and looked for deliverance from Thee!" To God we must ever look when there is darkness without and within. We must not let the sorrow and sin of the world rob us of our faith and hope. There can be no such thing as unchanging and persistent evil in the world, for God is never outside of His world. He is ever indwelling and at work in His moral as in His physical creation, and present in all shapes and depths of evil as the infinite spirit of goodness working for goodness, the everlasting Father and Saviour of men. O Israel, hope in the Lord, for with the Lord there is mercy and plenteous redemption.

FAZELY STREET DOMESTIC MISSION, BIRMINGHAM.

On Sunday last the anniversary services of the Church of the Messiah Mission, Fazely-street, were preached at the Church of the Messiah by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, of Manchester College, Oxford. There were good congregations, and the collections amounted to £68 19s.

On Monday the Rev. T. Pipe presented his annual report, which gave an account of a successful year's work. Reference was made to the social legislation of the past few years. With all these altered conditions, however, and others in progress, he said a domestic mission was as necessary as ever. In the neighbourhood there was an immense mass of struggling human beings without hopes, without interests, and without ideals. The Mission in the district was a centre of religious influence and social work. The Sunday evening congregations filled the chapel winter and summer alike. Sometimes they had more than they could accommodate. The service is remarkable for the number of men who attend.

The report went on to tell of the great variety of efforts for young and old which centre in the Mission, for teaching and recreation and mutual help, for the physical intellectual and moral well-being of the people.

The Rt. Hon. WILLIAM KENRICK moved the adoption of the report. He said the report, though full, gave no adequate idea of the splendid work being done by the Mission. He advised subscribers to go down and see for themselves, and they would come away determined, if possible, to increase their support. He had been down several times lately, and had always felt it to be inspiring. Recently he presided at a congregational meeting held at the Mission, when seventeen secretaries presented reports of their respective societies. These reports were written in many different styles, but they were all remarkable for the earnest spirit that breathed through them, and the record they gave of most successful work. The one thing that impressed him was that their missionary not only worked hard himself, but he had the faculty of setting others to work. The spirit of self-help breathing through the mission was remarkable and a testimony to the wise devotion of Mr. Pipe. They were working men and women, and yet they not only gave liberally of their time and money to the actual working of the agencies—which they had made to a large extent self-supporting—but they sent up more than sixteen pounds to the treasurer to help the general funds.

Dr. PRIESTLEY SMITH, in seconding the resolution, said he was greatly interested in what Mr. Pipe had said about the physical exercises and athletic clubs and classes. He was inclined to think it would be a good thing if all young men were obliged to go through a few years of good drill; the gain in discipline would be an immense benefit to themselves.

Rev. J. W. AUSTIN spoke in the highest terms of Mr. Pipe's work.

Councillor TITTEBTON said it was always a tonic to go down to the Mission at Fazely-street. The earnestness and enthusiasm were contagious.

Congratulatory addresses were also given by Messrs. T. H. Russell, P. Worsley, A. D. Skirron, and others.

MINISTER'S BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.

THE fifty-fifth annual meeting of this society was held in the vestry of the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, on November 14, the president, Mr. J. Arthur Kenrick, in the chair. There were present the Revs. J. W. Austin, J. C. Street, and I. Wrigley, Messrs. E. P. Beale (hon. treasurer), R. Peyton, T. W. Ryland, and T. H. Russell (hon. sec.). Apologies for absence were received from Dr. Carpenter (vice-president) and other members.

The directors' report stated that during the past twelve months £2,202 had been expended in 46 grants (distributed among 26 widows, 16 ministers and the orphan children of four former beneficiary members). Since the formation of the society over £60,000 have been distributed in such grants, numbering 1,430 in all, and the fund now stands at £68,801.

The attention of ministers who are not yet members of the society is specially directed to the following passage of the report:—

"In the course of the twelve months 7 beneficiary members have been elected, 1 has resigned, and 4 have died, leaving 199 names now on the roll. If this last figure is compared with the total number of Unitarian ministers, as give in the Essex Hall Year Book, it is at once apparent that many of our ministers are, doubtless for various reasons, outside the pale of the society's operations. That many of these are probably ignorant of its existence is suggested by the fact that the directors not unfrequently receive applications for membership from gentlemen who, on inquiry, are found to be ineligible under the laws on the ground of age, and who invariably express their regret that they, in common with many more, have never heard of the society's existence. It is difficult to see by what means, other than those already adopted, it is possible for the directors to bring the society to the notice of those for whose benefit it exists, and they would therefore appeal for help in this particular to those who are already beneficiary members, and who may often be able to point out the advantages of membership to ministerial friends, and especially to those who are just about to enter upon active professional life, and to whom it should therefore be a matter of importance to make timely provision for the future. During the year the following among other kind contributions to the funds have been received:—Miss Sharpe (London), £100; The executors of Mrs. E. A. Todd-Vance-Smith (Bowdon), £500."

Among the resolutions passed at the meeting was one of thanks to Mr. F. S. Bolton who retired from the office of auditor, which he had held for 31 years. Messrs. Russell Jolly and Edward Nettlefold were appointed auditors. The retiring directors and the executive officers were re-appointed.

In view of the Rev. F. H. Vaughan's strictures upon our two chief Societies, it may be well to recall the whole of the following passage from the last annual report of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association:—"In spite of the liberality and tolerance so happily characteristic of the thought and conduct of large numbers of people in the present day, it must be clear to any thoughtful observer of the religious world that the battle against superstition, perverse and narrow doctrine, and sectarian bitterness, is very far from being won, and that the task which the Association set itself to accomplish is only at its beginning. If Unitarianism is to exert the influence it should have upon the thought and life of the world, new churches for upholding its principles and faith must be established, and those centres, where able, earnest men are now labouring with devotion and zeal, must be maintained. The time is evidently come when larger demands must be met by those who believe in the truth and power of a rational, reverent religious faith; for increasing numbers of men and women are to-day in search of a religion which, while it does no violence to their intelligence, nurtures and quickens their noblest impulses for good, and makes real to them and to others the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man."

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.]

MR. VAUGHAN'S REPLY.

SIR,—I thank Mr. Harwood for his courteous letter. If a few more of our reputed leaders would help by their criticisms the younger men who are groping amid grievous difficulties, some good might result.

(1) Let me assure Mr. Harwood I have nothing to retract. The report, as far as summaries go, is accurate. The full text is stronger—that is the only difference.

(2) Mr. Harwood's reply does not touch my criticism. I called attention to the moral evils of our times, and the abandoned state of the Christian Church. I quoted two extracts from the official pronouncements of our two principal organisations to illustrate their ideals and indicate how inadequate those ideals are in the present crisis. Mr. Harwood replies by pointing to the volume of work done by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which I never questioned, and to the fact that the "spontaneous development" paragraph was torn out of its context, which was obvious.

This position Mr. Harwood does not argue; his letter does not give a hint that he even realises I criticised from quite a different point of view, for he makes no attempt to controvert the Church idea I suggested and which Mr. Whitaker has so brilliantly preached in successive numbers of THE INQUIRER. I have been waiting and waiting for some of our leaders to enter the lists against Mr. Whitaker, but there seems to be some fatal powerlessness even to dream that there can be another ideal in our midst beyond the two expressed by our leading organisations. How are we to interpret this silence?

(3) I rejected the Conference ideal of bare freedom as futile.

The antithesis between doctrine and pure religion never has been and never can be a live question. The issue is always between a lower and a higher doctrine. Religion, as Dr. Mellone (a teacher whose criticism of Unitarian theology in the "Leaders of Thought" and "Converging Lines" we have never come to terms with) tersely says, "religion appeals to a man thinking." Doctrine is the necessary intellectual form, without which we could not even think of religion, much less speak or preach it. Martineau stated this truth when he said that "in every congregation or wider aggregate there must be a fundamental agreement for the time being as to the main features of Christian doctrine, as well as the essentials of Christian Life." Let the Conference use its freedom to determine the main features of Christian doctrine that unites our group of churches and abandon their policy of seeking to organise Christendom on the abstract chimera of bare freedom without positive aims.

But, "as a mere matter of information," I question the truth of the Conference letter. The President does not follow the spontaneous freedom notion, for he is busy seeking to organise—and organisation is active interference.

Further, the Conference in reality does profess some sort of positive religion, e.g., belief in God—the most dogmatic part of the Christian faith. If not, ought we not to join forces with the Labour Church? In the Conference Report for 1906, the committee appeals to the churches which seek to promote "faith, freedom, and fellowship in religion." The plain man asks, "Faith in what? Freedom to do what? Fellowship in what religion? The Labour Church has faith—faith in Socialism; it rejoices in freedom—freedom to preach a social ideal, conditioned only by the consensus of experts. Socialism is its religion, in which the members find more fellowship than is to be found in our body. The logic of the Conference ideal surely demands their inclusion!

Again, the group of churches which the Conference represents accept an unwritten creed: 80, on Mr. Harwood's own showing, receive help from the organisation which exists to further that confession of faith. Let any minister cross the border and he must choose another denomination.

(4) Mr. Harwood thinks there is room for difference of opinion about the value of mere "protest." I think there is none. It is a poisonous delusion which blights all our missionary efforts. Theological errors, with the vital power of religion behind, cannot be destroyed by showing them to be illogical and uncritical. We destroy the man instead. To clear the ground first, as Mr. Harwood suggests, is to leave the soul empty, swept and garnished for seven devils worse than the first—the world and the lusts thereof.

This was not the missionary method of our Master. This is not the way Nature works; the living bud of a tree itself pushes off the dead leaves.

Martineau tried to recall us from the barren method of protest as early as 1838: "We should turn our attention not to orthodoxy, which has a faith and is satisfied with it, but to indifference, and unbelief and sin, which have it not and are satisfied without it. On these we should make aggression in the power of a positive religion." (Carpenter's Life of Martineau, page 221.)

How little he succeeded may be illustrated from this year's report of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. In a time when, we learn, four-fifths of Londoners go to no church, the Association "rejoices in the more liberal and tolerant opinions that now prevail and is glad to have helped in bringing about this wiser and kindlier state of feeling." But (page 4) it feels, however, "that the battle against superstition, perverse and narrow doctrine and sectarian bitterness is very far from being won, and that the task which the Association set itself to accomplish is only at the beginning." One asks in pained astonishment, what task? There are only one-fifth left in any church!

Had we not better concentrate on the world and its pathetic, tragic indifference? In this great battle we should welcome every minister of every denomination in the Church of Christ as a fellow-worker. But this would not mean ignoring our doctrinal differences. Rather, as Canon Barnett suggests, we must respect them and try by living in accord with our own doctrines to win men with the attractive power of religious life. Neither would it mean that we must adopt binding declaration of doctrine as the only alternative to the negative freedom ideal. Mr. Whitaker points the way out of dogma in THE INQUIRER for March 16, 1907. It does not lie in Church doctrine but in the Church itself—the spiritual Church.

“For an abstract idea” [the Fatherhood of God, or the Brotherhood of Man, mere phrases apart from Christ and his Church, which, however thickly the Van strews the highways with, will not save men] we must substitute a concrete object, for a proposition an organic life. . . . Love for a person will unite. Preach Christ crucified (not only on Calvary, but all through the Church’s life) and the intellectual difficulty is transcended.”

And in the task of making “our community, in little, an image of what it thinks the whole Church of Christ should be” is an idea worth living and dying for.

WARNING TO NORTHERN CHURCHES.

SIR,—Permit me to warn our northern laymen and ministers against a plausible Yorkshireman, above medium height, slight, grey, scant of hair, and about sixty years of age. He knows our schools and churches at Leeds, Bradford (Yorks), Newchurch, Ashton, &c., fairly well, and has now added Heywood to his list. His plan evidently is to be in the vicinity of one of our schools or churches at the weekend, worm himself on Sunday into the kindly interest of such as are keen on social service, under the pretence of seeking work, visit our charitable for two or three days with profit and commendable zeal, and move on in time to repeat the same game in another district.

T. BOWEN EVANS.

Heywood, Nov. 25, 1907.

CHURCHES IN GREATER LONDON.

SIR,—Your enthusiastic correspondent in your issue of the 23rd instant asks, whether “it is not time that something was done towards the provision of more Unitarian Churches for Greater London.” Before embarking on an effort in this direction, surely it would be well to seek an answer to the Rev. W. G. Tarrant’s question, reported in the same column, “How are we going to fill our own churches with our own people?” In fact, indifference to public worship largely prevails in the body, as is sufficiently manifested by the sparseness of the attendances at our churches in town and country. Whilst this is so it would seem useless, if not worse, to initiate such an effort as is suggested.

G. J. NOTCUTT.

Ipswich, Nov. 25, 1907.

NOTWITHSTANDING numerous press statements that the Rev. R. J. Campbell has promised to stand as an Independent Labour candidate at the next general election, we have the best authority for saying that he has given, and intends to give, no definite pledges, but will hold himself free to act as the exigencies of the future may demand.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London : Mansford street Mission.—The Rev. Gordon Cooper writes from The Parsonage, Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, E. May I remind those of your readers who subscribe to the Poor’s Purse and the Christmas Fund at the Mansford-street Mission, that I shall be glad to receive their contributions as soon as possible? And is it worth while adding that donations or subscriptions from other friends will also be most welcome? I know, Sir, that it is only a few weeks since I made my last appeal to your readers, but I do not hesitate to ask them again for their help. In a good cause, when the need is great, I am not ashamed to beg.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The congregation has suffered a severe loss in the death of one of its oldest, ablest, most devoted, and deeply loved members, Mr. Samuel Smethurst, who passed away at Colwyn Bay, where he had gone for the benefit of his health, on November 20, in his 67th year. Mr. Smethurst was well known and highly respected by his fellow-townsmen as an honourable, upright, and public-spirited man. Possessed of great business experience and ability, he was an invaluable member of the Church Council and Building Committee. He did not spare himself so far as time, work, and money were concerned, and it is to be feared that the large amount of business detail and long committee meetings, sometimes lasting until one and two o’clock in the morning, which have been rendered necessary during the last year or two, contributed to his somewhat unexpected and sudden end. Mr. Smethurst was one of the pioneer members of the congregation, and one of its representatives on the East Cheshire Union. The funeral took place at Hurst Cemetery, near Ashton, on Saturday, 23rd inst.

Belfast : First Church (Welcome Meeting).—A meeting to welcome the Rev. H. J. Rossington, M.A., B.D., to the pastorate of this church was held on November 13, in the Central Hall, when there was a large and representative gathering of members and friends of the congregation. The proceedings began with tea, after which Mr. John Rogers took the chair. Letters of apology for non-attendance were read from the Revs. Principal Gordon, W. H. Drummond, Dr. S. H. Mellone, and Joseph Worthington, and Mr. Bowman Malcolm. The chairman in a happy speech gave a very cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Rossington, which was heartily supported on behalf of the congregation by Messrs. George G. Ward, W. T. Hamilton, James Davidson, A. M. Cleland, and C. M. Cunningham, and on behalf of the other non-subscribing churches by the Rev. J. A. Kelly. Mr. Rossington, in his reply, gratefully acknowledged the kindly sentiments expressed by the different speakers. He said that he and his wife appreciated their welcome all the more because the speakers obviously expressed not only their own feelings but also those of the whole congregation. In one respect such a welcome seemed somewhat late, for since his arrival in June, so many people had individually said and done kindly things that he had already learned to know and appreciate the warmth of an Irish welcome and to feel that his ministry in Belfast had begun under the happiest auspices. It was at once a great privilege and a great responsibility to become the successor of the good and distinguished men who had served the First Church so faithfully in the past, but he felt that in his endeavour to uphold worthily such great traditions he could confidently count on their support and cordial co-operation. After indicating one or two respects in which assistance would be gratefully accepted, the speaker said that he and his wife were in deadly earnest and desirous of doing all in their power to promote the success of the church. If they accomplished all they hoped, and would try to accomplish, he was convinced that his hearers would find that a more fitting return for the welcome they had given to his wife and himself than any words he could say. In the meantime he would assure them that the kind sentiments expressed were most gratefully received and most heartily reciprocated. The remainder of the evening was devoted to music and conversation.

Birmingham : Midland Sunday-school Association.—A most successful reception was held in the Old Meeting Schools, Bristol-road, on Wednesday evening, November 20. The president, the Rev. J. Worsley Austin, and the committee issued invitations to all teachers in the schools connected with the Association, and about 200 responded. An excellent concert was provided after refreshments had been served, and speeches were delivered during the evening by Councillor G. H. Kenrick, Messrs. W. Byng Kenrick, and Ion Pritchard, the president, the Rev. W. C. Hall, and Rev. Thos. Paxton (secretary). A most enjoyable evening was spent, and the committee look forward to a very helpful and encouraging year’s work.

Bristol : Lewin’s Mead Domestic Mission.—On November 4th, a very successful Jumble Sale was held, over £13 being realised. During November concerts arranged by Mr. T. Gaylard, Miss Newton, and Mrs. Hartland have attracted good audiences. Lantern lectures have been given by the Rev. E. I. Frupp, and Mr. James Randall. On the 22nd inst., the half-yearly conference of the teachers connected with the Lewin’s Mead and the Mission Schools, took place at the Mission Hall. Miss Toddread an excellent paper on “The duties of the Sunday-school Teacher,” which was followed by a good discussion in which a large number of teachers took a part. Mr. J. Kenrick Champion presided.

Chatham (Farewell).—Last Sunday the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, B.A., preached farewell sermons to crowded congregations at Hamond Hill Church, in which he reviewed the four years of his happy ministry, and expressed his gratitude for the spirit of freedom and breadth of tolerance and good fellowship which had characterised the church. After evening service Mr. Mackay, the editor of the Observer, presided over a congregational meeting called to bid good-bye to Mr. and Mrs. Davis, and wish them God-speed on their journey to India, and success in the new work that there awaits them. Mr. Davis, he said, had come to them after a period in which there had been a great deal of iconoclasm, and had achieved a remarkable work of religious re-construction. Mrs. Miskin, of Frindsbury, on behalf of the congregation, with expressions of warm affection and gratitude toward the minister and his wife, presented him with a purse of gold. This was the second purse of gold and the fourth presentation made to Mr. Davis during his four years’ ministry at Chatham. Mrs. Prall then presented Mrs. Davis with a handsome gold and pearl pendant. A beautiful illuminated address on vellum, handsomely framed, is also being presented. Mr. and Mrs. Davis sail for Ceylon per R.M.S. Macedonia on Dec. 6. In Ceylon, in addition to his official duties, Mr. Davis proposes holding Sunday religious services.

Cork.—On Sunday, November 24, Rev. James Harwood, as representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, preached in the Princes’-street Church to probably the largest congregation that has assembled there on a Sunday for well nigh a quarter of a century. The committee of the Church, under their new minister, the Rev. G. V. Crook, have already manifested marked enthusiasm by renovating and beautifying the old church. The “Seven Services” and the “New Hymnal” have been adopted, and the singing was bright and hearty, and the entire service calculated to help and uplift the worshippers. After the service Mr. Harwood met the members of the congregation in the schoolroom, and gave them friendly advice about resuscitating the new-old church again. It may interest some to know that underneath Prince’s-street pulpit there were placed, in years gone by, two horses’ skulls, facing east and west; perhaps someone could enlighten us as to their history or suggest an explanation, the church being about two hundred years old.

Dover.—On November 19 the congregation of Adrian-street Church had the pleasure of a visit from the Rev. Joseph Wood, president of the National Conference. That his splendid address was fully appreciated was shown by the close attention paid by all present. After the service a conference was held, the Rev. C. A. Ginever in the chair. Mr. Wood spoke on various important subjects affecting the welfare of our churches. The following gentlemen also spoke: Rev. C. A. Ginever, Rev. S. Burrows, of Hastings, Mr. Edward Chitty, and Mr. Boyle from Deal.

Garston.—A brass tablet has recently been placed in the church, inscribed:—"To the memory of Alice Watson. This tablet was placed here by members of the congregation worshipping in this church. Oct. 1907. 'To live in hearts one leaves behind is not to die.'"

Gloucester (Appointment).—The congregation of the Barton-street Chapel have invited Rev. Rudolf Davis, B.A., district minister to the Western Union and minister of Christ Church Chapel, Bridgwater, to be their minister in succession to the late Rev. Walter Lloyd. Mr. Davis has accepted the invitation, and will begin his ministry when his successor has been appointed by the Western Union.

Leeds: Holbeck.—A successful congregational soirée was held on Saturday, Nov. 16. After tea a meeting, presided over by Mr. J. Senior, chairman of the church committee, was held in the large schoolroom. The chairman referred to the objects of the meeting, welcomed friends, alluded in kindly terms to the illness of the minister's wife, pleaded for regular attendance at the services in the church, and spoke of the interest of the minister's discourses. Music by the choir and other friends, and recitations, gave much pleasure to the goodly company present. The Rev. H. McLachlan gave an address on the Deepening of the Religious Life, and Mr. J. T. Dodgson, treasurer of the Y.N. Union, also spoke some friendly words. A pleasant meeting was brought to a close with votes of thanks.

Liscard.—The Rev. A. E. Parry, during his visit to America to attend the International Congress at Boston, preached at Fitchburg, Mass., where he received a very warm welcome. In response to a message of greeting and goodwill sent through him from the members of the First Parish Church at Pittsburg to his congregation at the Memorial Church, they recently held a meeting to receive the message, and passed with acclamation a resolution reciprocating the greeting with heartiest goodwill and fraternal sympathy, and earnestly welcoming such international interchanges both of men and of greetings as making for the friendship of nations and the peace of the world.

London: Kentish Town.—The Rev. T. P. Spedding, missionary agent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, is to preach at the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, next Sunday, both morning and evening. Friends in London will be glad to take this opportunity of hearing from Mr. Spedding some account of the work of the Van mission.

London Sunday School Society.—The annual social evening of teachers and elder scholars over sixteen of the London Sunday-schools was held at Essex Hall on Saturday, November 23. From six o'clock till seven, the visitors were received on behalf of the committee by Mr. Ion Pritchard, this year's president of the Society, and during that hour they were entertained to tea and were able to mix with visitors from other schools. At seven o'clock, when Mr. Pritchard took the chair, supported on the platform by the Rev. John Toye, last year's president, there was an audience of fully 300, who well filled the body of the hall and the front two or three rows of the gallery. After a hymn, "Sing we of the Golden City," had been heartily sung, Mr. Pritchard welcomed the teachers and scholars, and in a few happily expressed phrases, pointed out wherein success in Sunday-school work was to be obtained, especially emphasising the difference between the shadow and the substance of success. His school address was attentively listened to by the audience, and was followed by an interesting programme of music, &c. Unfortunately illness had at the last moment prevented Mr. Cecil Pearson and Mr. S. T. Lock from being present, but Mr. W. Savage Cooper and Mrs. Herbert Teasdale each sang an extra song, and Mr. Howard Young gave a reading, which nearly restored the programme to its original length. Miss Alice Glover, who played two 'cello solos, and Miss Ida Hingston, Mrs. Herbert Teasdale, and Mr. W. Savage Cooper who sung, were all well received, Mr. Cooper in especial delighting the audience, who encored him on each occasion. A story, from Mr. Pritchard and Mr. Young's reading completed the programme, and the proceedings were closed with a couple of verses of the hymn "Sun of my soul for ever near," and the benediction pronounced by the Rev. John Toye.

Manchester: Pendleton.—On Wednesday, November 20, a joint social of the Broughton, Monton, Swinton, and Pendleton congregations was held in the Pendleton Schoolroom, in connection with the Association Fund and United Bazaar, Easter, 1908. The Rev. and Mrs. N. Anderton acted as hosts, and there was a large attendance, representative of the four congregations, which filled the schoolroom. The excellent programme, the not less excellent refreshments, even the decoration of the room, were due to combined effort, and the complete success of the social augurs well for future co-operation among the congregations concerned. During the evening the Rev. Dendy Agate, chairman of the bazaar committee, gave a stirring address, setting forth the objects of the bazaar, and emphasising the fact that it was rendered necessary by the new work and responsibilities undertaken in the enthusiasm of the great effort of 1897. The Rev. N. Anderton, as chairman, also spoke, and referred with approval to the suggestion that Broughton, Swinton, and Pendleton, with individual help from Monton, which was doing its part chiefly by direct contributions to the Association Fund, should unite to provide a stall at the bazaar. There is little doubt that this suggestion will be approved, and carried through with success. Meanwhile, not the least of the good results of the joint social was the bringing together of members of four neighbouring congregations, many of whom were not previously known to each other, in social intercourse and good fellowship.

Mottram.—The 61st anniversary was celebrated by the Annual Party on Saturday, November 16, and anniversary services on Sunday, November 24. The party was a great success; over 240 sat down to tea, and there were about 280 at the meeting which followed. The minister, Rev. H. Bodell Smith, presided, and an excellent programme of glees, solos, action songs, recitations, and a dramatic dialogue entitled "Entangled" was well rendered. Addresses were given by the chairman and by Mr. J. H. Elkin, senior superintendent, and Mr. D. Gee, vice-president, of the congregation. The anniversary preacher was the Rev. W. G. Price, whose sermons were greatly appreciated, but the weather was unpropitious and the attendances were smaller than is usual on such an occasion.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Origin and Nature of Man, by S. B. G. McKinney, M.A., L.R.C.P., is a book of 479 pages, in the course of which the author tries to work out the idea that the recognition of an Archetypal man is the key to the origin and evolution of humanity on this earth. What most people are content to regard simply as a human ideal, he appears to regard as a definite supersensuous fact, the perception of which depends on one's spirituality. Another curious part of this theory is that "primitive man" (whatever may be understood by the term) had a clear vision of this supersensuous being, which has been the source of all the world's subsequent enlightenment, the vision itself having become obscured in later degenerate times. These appear to be the fixed ideas, to elucidate which the author employs considerable ingenuity and information. The book will be interesting to many as a psychological study where they can find no intrinsic worth in its main argument. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier, 5s. net.)

Storehouse for Preachers and Christian Workers, a treasury of outline sermons and addresses, collected by J. Ellis, consists for the most part of pulpit commonplaces of the orthodox type. There are, no doubt, speakers who will find it suggestive and helpful. [James Clarke & Co. 1s. 6d.]

WHAT MEN ARE SAYING.

WHAT MEN ARE DOING.

WHAT MEN ARE THINKING.

SEE PUBLIC OPINION.

A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.

Every Friday. Twopence.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political, and social progress.

What Mr. R. B. Haldane says of "Public Opinion":—

Dear Mr. Parker, I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion," under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed of men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists, the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.—Yours faithfully, R. B. HALDANE.

What Sir Gilbert Parker, M.P., says of "Public Opinion":—

Dear Mr. Parker,—I cannot but congratulate you on that excellent paper, "Public Opinion," which I read regularly. You have a journal of great influence and usefulness.—Yours truly, GILBERT PARKER.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 30 and 31, Temple House, Tallis-street, London, E.C. Specimens free on application.

JUST PUBLISHED. THE SOUL OF THE BIBLE.

By ULYSSES G. B. PIERCE.
(Unitarian Minister, Washington, U.S.A.)

With an Introduction by Edward Everett Hale

Size 5 by 7½ inches, pages 525, cloth binding, 3s. net, by post, 3s. 4d. Thin paper edition, size 4 by 6½ inches, cloth binding, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net, by post, 3s. 9d. Also ready shortly, flexible leather binding, red under gilt edges, narrow margins reducing the size to 3½ by 6 inches, 5s. net, by post 5s. 3d.

Selected passages from the Old and the New Testaments and the Apocrypha arranged as synthetic readings in Biblical order. Each reading (for they are readings rather than mere excerpts) is a literary unit, dealing with but one subject, and calculated to make a definite religious impression. In each selection the whole Bible is drawn upon as needed to develop the subject. Isolated passages are brought into natural relation with the larger thought of which they are generic parts, thus utilising many short passages of great beauty and power which would otherwise be neglected because of their fragmentary character. The book is provided with a list of the readings suitable for various occasions, an index of the more familiar religious topics, and with a general index. The selections are representative of what is best in the Bible, and the method of selection adopted is such as to reveal to the reader "the soul of the Bible."

The Practical Teaching of Jesus of Nazareth.

As Found in the Gospel According to Matthew.

Thirty-four Lessons compiled by
ARTHUR W. FOX, M.A.

The substance of these Lessons was given to a Bible Class held in connection with the Todmorden Sunday School Union, at which representatives of six Nonconformist denominations were present. The notes were found helpful by these; hence it is the compiler's wish to help other Sunday School Teachers, as far as he can. The main purpose of this little book is to bring out the practical teaching of the Christ, so that it may have its mighty influence in the formation of the character of the taught.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Order of Merit receives new lustre now that the name of Florence Nightingale is placed upon its roll.

We notice with sincere regret that we must bid farewell to the Seed Sower. In the December number the Editor announces its discontinuance. The Seed Sower has been, to our mind, the best and most useful magazine, "for the church, the school, and the home," which we have ever had. It was specially adapted to serve as the central part of a parish magazine, for issue with church calendars, as at Essex Church and elsewhere. For sixteen years the Seed Sower has been published. "It has followed," says the Editor, in a valedictory note, "an independent line, caring much less for sectarian propaganda than for the promotion of the Liberal Faith everywhere." But that surely is the spirit which should animate all the churches of our fellowship, and it does not appear to us very creditable to the intelligence or the idealism of our people that this little magazine should now suffer extinction.

THIS last number of the Seed Sower contains a Birthday Sermon by Dr. Robert Collyer, on "The King's Question," which, in its gracious wisdom and the happy light of faith, will be a word especially welcome to those for whom the evening is closing in. There is also a short article on "Dying Leaf and Dying Year" by the late Frances Power Cobbe, and a paper on "What our Guild is doing" by Miss M. Twist, of Birmingham. The last of the "Notes and Jottings" by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas are full of highly controversial matter, and the pages of such a monthly magazine as the Seed Sower has been are perhaps hardly the most appropriate place for the introduction of such challenges. For one thing there is no room for adequate discussion (and the ideal Parish Magazine is for peace not a sword), and then a month is too long to wait for such interchange of views. Mr. Thomas asks for "a full, free, and frank discussion." We shall be prepared, after Christmas, to afford in these columns ample space for such a discussion, but for the moment we cry a Truce.

DR. DRUMMOND'S new book "Studies in Christian Doctrine" is announced for publication on New Year's Day. It promises to be of profound interest, dealing as it does with fundamental questions of the religious life. In the first part, which deals with the sources of religious doctrine, there are chapters on the Human Mind, the Bible, and the Church. In the second part, on the Doctrine of God, the opening chapter is on "Primary Conceptions of God," and the second on the doctrine of the Trinity. (That will be a chapter which may be profitably studied side by side with Dr. Illingworth's new apologetic work on that doctrine.) The third part is on the Doctrine of Man, and the fourth on "The Relation between God and Man as affected by historical conditions." This includes exhaustive chapters on the person and the work of Christ, and also on "The Church: Its Origin and Idea," and on "Means of Grace." The book closes with a chapter on Eschatology.

"STUDIES of Christian Doctrine" is to be published by Mr. Philip Green at Essex Hall, and Dr. Drummond concludes his preface with the following sentences:—"I must acknowledge, with warm thanks, the generosity and confidence with which the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association undertook to publish a work which they had not seen, and in the preparation of which they exacted no conditions. The authorities of that association are well aware that it is not in me to write a party manifesto, and they can have no wish to receive such at my hands. This fact proves, what it may be as well to state explicitly, that members of the association are in no way committed to any opinions which are expressed in this volume, nor am I committed to any opinions but my own, and to these only so long as the evidence appears to me to render them certain or probable. We have no authoritative creed to which individual thought must bow. We all alike have but one aim, Truth; and truth presents itself in many partial phases to differently constituted minds. There are diversities of opinions, but one Spirit; and all faithful souls are moving, on different sides, towards one luminous peak, where Truth stands transfigured in heavenly light, far above the fogs and doubts of earth."

OKLAHOMA, the forty-sixth American state, has been admitted to the Union with a singularly advanced form of constitution. For twenty-one years it will remain prohibitionist; its government is empowered to engage in any occupation or business for public purposes, except in certain forms of agriculture; and its people have the Swiss powers of referendum and initiative.

A RECENT number of Charities and the Commons, the weekly journal of Philanthropy and Social Advance, issued by the New York Charity Organisation Society, printed the following notice in the centre of a page to illustrate an article "Shop Early!" by the secretary of the National Consumers' League:—"To Christmas Shoppers. Buy your presents early—Early in the day and early in December. That will be your biggest gift of the holidays—to the workers behind the counters and on the delivery wagons."

At a conference of the North London Congregational Union, the Rev. H. Varley gave the following as the reason why, in his opinion, men were kept from attendance at church—"Officialism, the spirit of class, critical doubt (including doubt as to the perfect honesty of the preacher), unpractical preaching, the failure of church life to reflect the love inculcated by Christ, avoidance of the needs of the social life of to-day, and lastly, a distrust of what seemed the Christian scheme of morality."

How to raise money for church purposes is a problem which is always with us. Many minds, many methods. But a popular method in some of the Free Churches is for the minister to state a day on which he will sit in his vestry to receive contributions. If we mistake not this method was first devised by the late Mr. Spurgeon, who by that means collected, annually, large sums of money for his orphanages. Several prominent Baptist ministers copied the method, and now Congregationalists are proving its efficacy. Lately Dr. Horton sat in his vestry for the purpose of receiving donations toward his new institutional buildings. Money poured in from 200 contributors, many city men calling with welcome gifts on their way home from business, and at the close of the day the donations totalled over £2,000.

SPEAKING of Dr. Horton, we are gratified to see that he is persisting in his campaign against an impure press. Last Sunday evening he devoted his sermon to the subject. He said that 200 papers were kept going by competitions which were to all intents and purposes lotteries. More than a million sixpenny postal orders per month were being sent to these papers as entrance fees for what was practically a gamble. Then there was the fleshly school of novelists who were doing untold mischief. He thought that parents and guardians were under as great obligations to exclude from their children bad characters in books as in real life. He pleaded for a strong and healthy protest by society against all decadent and demoralising publications.

AFTER meeting for ten years in hired premises, Hampstead Friends, on the 21st to 23rd ult., opened a meeting-house of their own, under interesting circumstances. On the evening of the 22nd, Dr. Claude Taylor, on behalf of the local Friends, welcomed 150 "neighbours," including the Vicar of Christ Church, and the ministers of the Baptist, Congregational, Presbyterian, and Unitarian congregations, who, in their turn, offered fraternal welcome to Friends in their new home. The building contains, besides the meeting-room, a large basement room for the adult school, and a library and reading-room on the first floor. A tea-party for the working builders and their wives was suitably included in the opening functions.

THE Charity Organisation of Society of New York celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary with a three days' conference, opened on Tuesday evening, November 19, by a great gathering in Carnegie Hall, when the audience of 2,500 included a multitude of social workers gathered from many cities. Dr. Emil Münsterberg, head of the Public Charities of Berlin, brought the greetings of his society, and a valuable gift, the first of the hundred volumes (all of which are to be given) of the reports collated by the German National Conference of Charities. Among those taking part in the meetings were representatives of the United Hebrew Charities, the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, and the Charity Organisation Society itself.

At the opening meeting the President, Mr. Robert W. de Forest, said that they had come together not to eulogise the past, but to set the course for another quarter century. Charities and the Commons, says of the meetings:—"To co-operate with all available agencies, to strike at causes of poverty, to prevent waste in the handling of charitable funds, to correlate the forces of philanthropy, to enable democracy to express itself by clearing away obstacles—these were the points emphasised by the speakers, with no exception. Prevention, not alleviation, and justice, not charity, is the new view of organised effort."

An earnest body of students in Leiden University have just established a new union for the study of ethical and religious questions. A meeting was held on Thursday evening, November 7, which was largely attended, not only by students, but by teachers interested in the proposed union, including Professors Oort, Knappert, Groenewegen, and Lake. Professor Eerdman gave an address on "Religion in the Modern World," and he was followed by Professor J. P. Kuenen, who spoke on "Religion and Natural Science." His declaration that there was absolutely no inconsistency between the two was enthusiastically received by the meeting. It was then determined to draft rules for the union, and at a subsequent meeting, on November 15, the society was formally inaugurated. The plan is to have at least four meetings a year with addresses, and an annual religious service, and also to form reading circles under the guidance of senior students for the study of ethical and religious questions, and to maintain a library of books and magazines. The union already has 124 members, of whom only 33 are theological students, the rest being medical, law, natural science, or arts men. The union is not established in opposition to the existing students' Orthodox Christian Society, but aims at doing positive and constructive religious work on a broad liberal basis.

In the important Memorandum issued on Nov. 23 and signed by Sir Robert Morant, which deals with the medical inspection of school children, it is made clear that the object of the Board of Education is much more than the mere collection of statistics. It aims at "the physical improvement, and, as a natural corollary, the mental and moral improvement of coming generations. The broad requirements of a healthy life are comparatively few and elementary, but they are essential, and should not be regarded as applicable only to the case of the rich." Obviously, these "broad requirements" cannot be secured even by the three medical inspections proposed in the memorandum; this is recognised, and a close co-operation is urged as between the school authorities and the authorities having supervision of water, milk, and food supplies, housing, and sanitation. Sir Robert Morant also directs the attention of local authorities to the Provision of Meals (Children's) Bill; and it may be hoped that the work of medical inspection may be followed by whatever provision is found to be necessary in this direction. It should be added that the Memorandum points out that, in all these matters, the action of the State will tend to increase, rather than to lighten, the parents' sense of responsibility, and will demand their loyal co-operation.

An old friend of the late Lord Battersea wrote a beautiful tribute in the Westminster Gazette of November 28. Cyril Flower, who was born in 1843, was Liberal Whip in Gladstone's last administration, when in 1892 he was raised to the peerage. He was a great lover of art, and delighted in sharing beautiful gifts with others. This is how his friend wrote of him:—"The lonely, the poor, and the old never felt their day was over when they had once become known to that host whose welcome as he greeted his guests on his beautiful staircase makes to-day such mournful music in the hearts that remember that gracious hospitality. Many a day, after some entertainment, he would lead aside someone whose feet he knew trod the doorstep where luxury never entered and were want too often reigned. He would collect the fruit and flowers and say in a word they were to go where they would bring comfort; or he himself would be the minister. He shrank greatly from sickness and pain in others; disease was to him a very awful thing, but he never shrank from remembering it and helping others to face it. Who shall attempt to say what were the number of errands of mercy he undertook, or the secret acts of thoughtful kindness which he rendered personally? To the suffering and old he brought the sunshine of his life. Where he was himself happiest was in the company of the little children, and no child but was happy with this careful guardian. Instinctively he knew the desire of the smallest heart, and no fairy prince fulfilled those dreams more wisely. He loved them with an unselfish affection, and he made even the children selfless in his presence. Very literally and beautifully was he all things to all men. He knew the lives of those who worked for him as he knew the lives of intimate friends. He was at home in all social spheres, and his tact and quick apprehension made him often the friend in need and the friend indeed."

MESSRS. A. & C. BLACK'S Books of Reference, Who's Who, the Who's Who Year Book, and the Writers' and Artists' Year Book for 1908, are announced for publication this week. Between two and three thousand new biographies have been added to the first, which, in spite of its increasing roll of names, has not grown too bulky to handle conveniently. Both the Year Books have also grown in size, and contain new tables not to be found in any other reference books.

DR. CARPENTER, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, is to give a lecture on Wednesday evening at a special service at the Fort-road Unitarian Church, Bermondsey. "The First Three Gospels and How to Read Them" is Dr. Carpenter's subject. The service begins at 8 o'clock.

HE that has lost his virtuous purposes, holy aspirations, devout hopes, whose soul has abdicated its high seat and become subject to the world, like the sapless and verdureless tree, is already struck with death.—Ephraim Peabody.

THE most truly religious thing that a man can do is to fight his way through habits and deficiencies, and back to pure, manlike elements of his nature, which are the ineffaceable traces of the divine workmanship, and alone really worth fighting for.—J. Weiss.

LITERATURE.

WREDE'S "PAUL."*

THE Rev. E. W. Lummis's translation of Dr. Wrede's treatise on "Paul" is a valuable contribution to our literature. An English dress rarely sits so well on a foreign visitor. The book is not a large one, but comes (as is the custom nowadays) unburdened with critical apparatus, simply to state the author's verdicts. Assurance of his competence is given in Principal Carpenter's description of him—"a brilliant investigator and a teacher of profound sincerity and earnestness. Into the sketch which these pages contain he has condensed the results of laborious years." Few, we would hope, to whom the study of the New Testament is of importance will allow such a book to pass them by.

Wrede accepted eight of the thirteen Pauline epistles as really coming from the Apostle. These in chronological order are I. Thessalonians, Galatians, I. and II. Corinthians, Romans, Colossians, Philemon, and Philipians. He regarded the view that all the Pauline letters belong to a later time as a critical aberration. "The forger is yet to be born who could devise such unforced, individual, purely personal utterances, born of the moment, as are here found in abundance, and at the same time make the letters as a whole seem to reveal in their author a fixed, finished, original personality." With this body of literature in hand, the author proceeds to the delineation of the Man and his Life-work, his Theology, and his Place in the Christian development.

Of course, these are well-worn themes; but much freshness is imparted to them in Wrede's handling. The personality of the Apostle emerges with a life-like solidity under the successive touches, often seeming to be slight and unimportant, that set forth what we may know of him from his own writings. Wrede offers no exaggerated estimate of the Apostle's literary power, such as is too often presented by devout admirers rather than candid judges. There is "some degree of schooling" to be traced in the epistles; the style, though laboured and palpably inaccurate, shows a sense of rhetorical form and a prose rhythm not to be attained without instruction and practice. This points to Greek influence, yet the most pregnant circumstance is that "in the main, the culture of Paul is the culture of the Rabbis." In Jerusalem he had learned the "forensic method of dealing with evidence," and "the art of subtle polemic."

So much for outfit. The man's pre-Christian days show him to have been a genuine fanatic, but not of the baser sort. "Warfare against false belief is for him a duty towards God." He becomes "converted"—whatever the process or the event. Wrede does not attempt precision on the point. "Suppositions are cheap, knowledge is dear." The material consideration is that the change in St. Paul was not a moral one. "The intrinsic metal of his soul remained the same,"

"Paul the Christian and Paul the Pharisee are not two persons but one." What happened was the overmastering of the whole man by a conviction that put, "as it were, a new soul" into him. He feels a new freedom, granted purely of "Grace." He, the unworthy, has been wondrously blessed. Gratitude and longing seize upon his nature, he is uplifted into the sense of a new world about him. Rapt as he is into high communings, he is still an eminently practical man. Labours and perils do not daunt him, or divert him from his recognised duty. Devout, enthusiastic—he is something more. "He was not free from a certain ambition—coloured by religion, no doubt, but still ambition." He is lowly, but he knows how truly he exceeds the rest in toil for the gospel. He finds a special "glory," which nothing can induce him to surrender, in the fact of his renouncing the apostolic right to maintenance. "The heavenly reward never loses its significance for Paul." But this trait of "the old Pharisee" is to be deemed "a collateral, subsidiary motion, not more." What is of much greater significance is his "egoism." God had specially selected him for a special work. Let not this be put down to a diseased imagination. Paul saw visions, but he was not prone to seek them. Doubtless the experience on the road to Damascus was that of a man with an epileptic tendency. A degree of morbid excitability was in his nature; yet there must not be any exaggeration. Emotional, high-wrought, fervid he may appear, from time to time, in his letters; but there were "strong elements in his character which set a dam against the overflow of visionary fanaticism; chief of these was his tense will, but besides this his keen eye for the actual things in his field of view, and his power of intelligent thinking."

Perhaps of more immediate interest to the modern mind, we find in Paul an attitude of indifference, passing at times into aversion and enmity, towards particular things in nature. "The lilies of the field and the fowls of the heaven are nothing to him." He shows no sympathy with the nobler fruits of culture. He despises worldly science, trade and industry are not interesting as such; he has so little appreciation of family life as to regard as a gift of grace the absence of inclination that way. Civic independence has little concern for him. "In the world in general and in its life he sees only the nothingness, the sickness, the ruin wrought by sin." This pessimism goes along with absorption in a religion which left no room for worldly interests. His was a pessimism shared by others in his day, Jew and Pagan.

As to his moral self, Wrede shrinks from calling Paul a "specifically ethical personality," though he assigns him a high place among the great moral characters. Kind he was, "still we do not receive the impression of an exceptional natural kindness, an indefeasible benevolence towards mankind as such." The Philipians were affectionate people—to them his most loving letter naturally went. But he is ready to deal severely with offenders if also ready to pardon. He grows incensed, becomes rough, harsh, bitter, ironical, roundly curses the "false apostles," calls them "dogs." No doubt wrath was inevitable, but "he paints them altogether too black." On their part, his enemies said things about him, odiously slanderous no doubt, yet possibly indicating where his faults lay. "At any rate his letters contain traces of a certain pliancy, we might also say tactic, which offered a handle to unfavourable interpretations." Wrede traces a certain amount of "calculation" in the letters here and there (e.g., Philemon), and yet withdraws the term as too coarse for the innocent dexterity exhibited.

We learn something of the Apostle in the fact that he did not possess absolute sovereignty over the hearts of the members of his communities. Beside his external deficiencies, there must have been some inner causes. Was he not rather a "master" than the "friend beloved"?

"Enough of details," says the author summing up. "He whom we have sketched is no saint, but a man. Edification would cover up such a figure with a conventional, monotonous, neutral tint, that of the ideal Christian. This is not good. Paul had some real weaknesses, perhaps more than we see. They are, as it seems, the frailties of one who, possessing a passionate, excitable temperament, identifies his own person wholly with the will of God; or shall we say of one who lives for an end, and measures all men and all things by their relation to that end? . . . His character is far from being reducible to that harmony which can be allotted to more tranquil souls. But one spirit breathes through it all; it is permeated by the one great thought of his life, which arises out of his religion. For this he toils, sacrifices, strives, lives, and dies. And so he remains not merely a great, but a noble character; a faithful steward, to his very depths an unselfish fighter, and a true hero."

For what Wrede has further to say, with original suggestiveness, of the missionary work of the Apostle, and concerning his theology, and finally on the subject of Paul's contribution to the development of Christian thought and culture, we must refer our readers to the book itself. Enough, we trust, has been said to make it clear that this is a book not to be neglected.

THE TEACHING OF JESUS.*

MR. Fox has compiled thirty-four lessons on the teaching of Jesus, as recorded in the Gospel according to St. Matthew, and has produced a work which may be of great value to Sunday-school teachers. The plan adopted is first to give a reading from the Gospel; and we are glad that he gives the words of this reading in his own book, and does not merely refer the reader to the New Testament, for the average reader will never have two books open before him at the same time. Then comes a general note which tells what is most needful for the understanding of the passage, next three or four paragraphs of comment and explanation; and finally,

* "The Practical Teaching of Jesus of Nazareth." By A. W. Fox, M.A. (London: Sunday School Association, Essex Hall, 1s. 6d. net.)

a page or two of illustrations fully described, with further references to additional illustrations in well-known books. Thus the teacher is amply provided with material for a thoroughly good lesson, and he can best prepare to give it by first filling his own mind with what is here written, and then speaking what he has to say in his own language. Abundant material is collected for him. He has not to hunt about for books and spread them out on a table before he can begin his preparation. All he needs is in one small volume which he can slip into his pocket and study whenever and wherever he has spare time. The book deals with the practical teaching of Jesus, and deals with it in a thoroughly practical way, suited to the actual requirements of our Sunday-schools.

The subject is a good one, and Mr. Fox treats it without encumbering his pages with controversial matter, so much so that he was able to give his original lessons on the subject to a Bible class attended by representatives of six Nonconformist denominations. Here and there some slight disadvantage may have arisen out of this method of treatment; but, taken as a whole, the book affords an admirable example of how the use of the New Testament may be kept free from sectarian difficulties, and it is a valuable contribution to undenominational religious teaching.

The book is so good that we are sorry it is not perfect, and in particular that it has not had the benefit of the editing which used formerly to be one of the strong features of the publications of the Sunday School Association. It is so easy to make slips, which another mind can detect more easily than the original writer; and while Sunday-school books are often best written by those actively engaged in such schools, they may owe much of their permanent value to the supervision of one whose main work lies in the study. For instance, on p. 12, Mr. Fox speaks of Charles Darwin, and then adds: "In his quiet Cambridge home." Of course it should be "Kentish home"; it is Darwin's sons who live at Cambridge. Then on p. 81 we read, "Galileo, the great Italian who first found out that the earth moves round the sun." This is unfair to Copernicus, whose book announcing his views appeared in 1543, while Galileo's work belongs to the next century, when his principal treatise on the subject was a dialogue on the Copernican and Ptolemaic systems.

There are other points which we have noticed on which there may be legitimate difference of opinion, and on this account the teacher who would really study his subject may well wish to consult further authorities. On p. 10 we are told that the "word 'blessed' really means 'happy.'" No one will admit this who shares the feeling which Carlyle has expressed in Sartor Resartus; indeed, scores of passages might be collected from great writers to show that blessedness means more than happiness. On p. 27 we have a passage dealing with the text Matt. v. 18, "Till heaven and earth pass away one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all things be accomplished." We are told that by this Jesus meant that "the slightest moral law will not have done its work until all men obey it to the full." This may be an explanation suited to the six denominations of Nonconformists, but it is an example of making the Bible say what it does not mean, as when six days of creation are declared to be long epochs of time. Assuredly, when Jesus spoke of "the Law," he meant, and all his hearers understood him to mean, the Law of Moses contained in the Pentateuch, and this particular passage cannot be satisfactorily explained without recourse to the Higher Criticism and the conditions under which the Gospel of Matthew was compiled. In dealing a little later with the texts that inculcate non-resistance, Mr. Fox says that "the literal meaning must not be pressed or the force of the teaching will be lost." Surely, the best way of meeting the difficulty of teaching precepts of Jesus which our own consciences do not enforce is to say that the injunctions given by Jesus were intended for the circumstances of his own time, and are not applicable under changed circumstances. Dr. Martineau once powerfully illustrated this by the case of a missionary among African savages whom he tries to convert to Christianity. After making his first converts he sends them out to convert others, and warns them that no ill treatment, however brutal, must tempt them to retaliate. Under such conditions the warning would be as wise as it would be truly Christian, and the conditions would essentially resemble those of the time of Jesus. They are very different under modern democratic civilisation, when the people are themselves the authority responsible for maintaining law and order. On p. 54 we are told that "righteousness here means almsgiving" (Matt. vi. 1). Is it not rather the case that the change from the A.V. is a real improvement, and that the larger meaning of righteousness includes the three things, almsgiving, prayer, and fasting, all of which are not to be done to be seen of men? On p. 79 we have this passage, "If a poor man steals a turnip to keep him from starvation, he is a thief, and is punished severely. If a rich landowner steals acres of the common land, on which the children used to play, his offence is passed over." Now do these words describe real facts? When is a poor man severely punished for stealing a turnip to keep him from starvation, and when does a landowner steal acres of common land? Mr. Fox writes as though these things were going on now. Surely this is not the case. Great tenderness is exercised towards starving men, and it is poor men, not rich men, who acquire a title to land by squatting on it. If Mr. Fox refers to any proceedings taken under Enclosure Acts, he should make it clear that what was done during the first half of the nineteenth century, before the Corn Laws were abolished, dates from a time when all who enclosed and cultivated land were public benefactors, and that what is done now is most carefully regulated in the interests of justice, and can no more be called stealing than any other appropriation under an Act of Parliament. On p. 150 we are told that the parable of the Two Sons may refer to the case of the Jews and the Gentiles. This is the line of argument which leads to denying that Jesus himself can have spoken the Parable of the Prodigal Son, and Dr. Martineau was prepared to accept this on the ground that Elder and Younger brother so well represented the relation of Jews and Gentiles during Apostolic times. But it also represents the relation between the Pharisee and Jewish "sinners" actually living in the time of Jesus, and it is worth something if we can maintain that this is the point of the parable of the Two Sons. On p. 167 we are told that the horse-shoe is nailed on stable doors because of the horse in the stable at Bethlehem. We believe a very different explanation really explains the efficacious charm ascribed to horse-shoes, but it is not one suited to Sunday-school teaching.

We are glad to see on p. 112 Mr. Fox refers to Mark iii. 21 for the right explanation of the reason why Jesus said that his disciples were his mother and his brethren, Matt. xii. 46—50. When his own family said that he was beside himself they started the cruel accusation that he had a devil. Much in the other three Gospels may be elucidated by a previous study of Mark, which contains the groundwork for the real life of Jesus. While the record contained in other Gospels may be of priceless value in supplementing Mark, they seldom or never have the right to correct the impression made in the earliest Gospel, and the value to us of the supplement will largely depend upon our having first thoroughly mastered the groundwork.

Here we must take leave of Mr. Fox's capital little book, and our best wish for it is that it may soon reach a second edition, which can have the advantage of more thorough revision.

ANCIENT CIVILISATION.*

M. CHARLES SEIGNOBOS is known to some English readers by his "Political History of Contemporary Europe," a translation of which was published by Mr. William Heinemann in 1901. The "History of Ancient Civilisation" now appears in an English dress, and we feel constrained to say that the garment is not exactly suitable. Indeed, we fear that the volume is liable to mislead and disappoint those who are unacquainted with its French original. The truth is the book is insufficiently explained. If M. Seignobos' preface had been retained the English reader would have been duly informed as to the nature and contents of the volume; but, instead of this, the anonymous editor, and, we presume, translator of the work, merely vouchsafes an editor's note in which he states that he has utilised both editions of the "Histoire de la Civilisation." This is an unfortunate omission, for in a work touching so vast a subject it is very necessary to know the intention of its author. And of this M. Seignobos makes no secret. "Tout mon désir," he says, "a été de composer un livre exact et instructif que l'élève puisse lire sans dégoût et comprendre sans fatigue." Again, he tells us that his work is not a "résumé, mais un abrégé." And though our dull wits may not be able to estimate this subtle distinction of terms, still we know what an abridgment or compendium is, and a compendium for the use of young students in a two years' course is very different from an original and serious treatise on that vast and intricate subject, the history of ancient civilisation.

But we not only miss the author's preface, which would have explained all this, we also miss the cuts. Those figures, 105 of them "dans le texte," should surely have been reproduced. According to the poet Rogers, a certain work would have been "dished except for the plates," and we certainly think the plates would have done much not only to adorn, but also to explain this volume.

It is a book crammed with information which might have been more critically sifted; though perhaps it would have been a misfortune for young people to have been deprived of some of the delightful stories of Herodotus and others which the book contains. Our author is somewhat too absolute in asserting that "the peoples of the other races" (i.e., the black, red, and yellow) "have remained savage or barbarian, like the men of pre-historic times." In a note he partially excepts the Chinese, and the editor adds, "the Japanese should be included." But even these concessions are not sufficient. What of the civilisation in Mexico and Peru, so brilliantly described by Professor Albert Réville?

On p. 191 we notice a curious slip, "Mercenames defended him against his enemies." Let us hope the English reader will not take "Mercenames" for a person, but translate it into "mercenaries," as the translator should have done. A few of the author's inaccuracies are corrected by the editor. The style is somewhat jerky and disconnected. M. Seignobos, in the preface to which we have alluded, disclaims any attempt at elegance; and if this is true of the French original, we can hardly expect to find much grace in a translation into English. But through the harsh, abrupt style may be perceived flashes of true insight into character. The hard, formal, prosaic Roman character is well expressed. "The Roman gods are punctilious as to form." "When the Roman prays it is not to lift his soul and feel himself in communion with a god, but to ask of him a service."

The survey of such a far-stretching past in one volume cannot be anything but superficial and fragmentary, but it is full of interest. It gives something like a bird's-eye view of an immense territory; and what a scene of cruelty and folly, misery and greed, waste and slaughter it is! We see "the nations, groping on their way, stumbling and falling in disastrous night"; always stumbling, always falling, "yet hoping ever for the perfect day."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE Contemporary this month has the second of Professor Henry Jones's articles on "Idealism and Politics" to which we have referred in our leading article. There is also a very suggestive article on "Liberalism and Christianity," by the Rev. J. D. Sinclair, who maintains that the true principles of Liberalism are in fact identical with the Christian doctrine of life as it is found in the New Testament. Its principle is democratic. It trusts the people, and calls them to life, laying on them the responsibilities of true citizenship. And this great example of Liberalism Mr. Sinclair gives: "Mr. Morley says that Mr. Gladstone was the first statesman of the front rank who made the people believe that he really cared for them. . . . Mr. Gladstone, singularly among our past great statesmen, gave the people not benevolence and benefits merely, but that charity of the mind which is justice, deliberately and of set purpose he brought them into counsel, and required of them both intelligence and conscience in their public concerns. And that outlook on the people and the people's concerns, not merely humane but in that deeper sense human, that faith in the people and desire after them which was more and more characteristic of Mr. Gladstone, belongs essentially to Liberalism."

Mr. W. T. Stead contributes some very interesting "Impressions from the Hague." For the four months the Peace Conference was sitting he edited its Courier, and so had exceptional opportunities of coming into personal contact with the members. He gives a very pleasant account of the goodly company. "Whatever may be thought," he says, "of the actual output of work of the Conference—and it is much more important than is popularly realised—the Conference itself, regarded as the first attempt ever made to assemble the representatives of the whole world in a single Chamber, must be pronounced a remarkable success."

In the Nineteenth Century and After Mgr. Canon Moyes writes on "Modernism and the Papal Encyclical," without a spark of sympathy for the ideal of the liberals, starting from the enormous assumption of the Roman Church: "The only liberty which she denies to her members is that of saying 'no' where God has said 'yes,'" implying that what "the Church" says is what God says. Sir Alfred Wills, writing on "Criminals and Crime," makes a strong plea for the reform of criminal procedure, on the same lines as Sir Robert Anderson, showing how much salutary discrimination there already is between juvenile offenders and habitual criminals. Earl Russell in his article on "The Church and the Law" has some severe things to say about the Bishops, especially with reference to their attitude towards the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. Professor Giles, writing on "The Opium Edict and Alcohol in China" finds plenty of amusement in recounting the long record of former centuries of drunkenness in China, and appears to think that the present opium habit is in comparison innocuous, and that the decree against opium may mean a return to disreputable drinking habits. He clearly has a strong dislike of the Anti-Opium Society. Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton writes of Dickens' Christmas Stories, for the sake of making a moving Christmas appeal for the children of "Famine Street."

In the Albany Review we find five pages of verse by Mr. Henry Bryan Binns, entitled "The Wanderer: being words for Botticelli's Birth of Venus." In the first strophe it is the Earth Spirit that speaks:—

"What car is this ye blow?
And what is this white Blossom of the cool grey Sea
That worshipping ye hasten Her and throw
Flowers after Her in glee?
* * * * *
And tell me, tell me, wherefore are her eyes
Purposeful, infinite,
Transcending any thought,
As though unto the Sea the streams had brought,
From the mountains where they rise,
High ultimate passion
Of tempest and of stress,
Out of its wonder, in the deeps, to fashion
This loveliness?"

A prose description of this great picture and a coloured print of it will be found in the "Botticelli" which Mr. Binns has just published in Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack's Artist Series.

Cornhill has two very pleasant letters by Mr. Frederic Harrison written from Montreux and Col de Jaman in October, making an article on "The Alps once More." Mr. A. C. Benson contributes the sixth of his articles "At Large," this time on "Specialism," and the virtues they may cultivate who are not specialists.

THE FREEDOM OF THE WILL DEFENDED BY PHILOSOPHICAL EXPERTS.

If we may judge from the contents of the October numbers of The International Journal of Ethics, and of Mind, it seems by no means improbable that the negative views respecting Free-will, which have for many years been dominant in our chief universities, will not much longer enjoy undisputed possession of the field. Not many years ago Mr. F. H. Bradley, in his work on Appearance and Reality, said, "Considered either theoretically or practically, Free-will is, in short, a mere lingering chimera. Certainly no writer who respects himself can be called on any longer to treat it seriously." We wonder what his present sentiments are on this subject, seeing that in the Oxford college, next door to his own, Dr. Schiller is now most seriously and eloquently advocating the libertarian side of the question. But it is not the Pragmatists alone who are now contending for the truth of the so-called "lingering chimera." From among the foremost of Dr. Edward Caird's pupils, in Oxford's most philosophical college, there came forth a few years ago a young thinker, Dr. Hoernlé, whose articles in Mind at once showed him to possess quite exceptional philosophical power. Soon after leaving Balliol, he was appointed assistant professor of philosophy at St. Andrews, and it is from that university that he has contributed to the present number of the International Journal of Ethics, an elaborate paper on "The Conception of Possibility in its Relation to Conduct," in which he vigorously defends the validity of the ordinary judgment of mankind that in temptation it is open to the human personality to take either of two equally possible courses.

"We refuse," he says, "to believe that the alternative possibilities which our decision now makes impossible, were impossible from the start, and seemed open only by an illusion born of ignorance. Prior to decision—that is our belief apart from sophistication by theories—the result is undetermined, not because of the incompleteness of the knowledge of the conditions, but simply because the decision which determines it has not yet taken place. And by this we mean that we could have willed differently; that our actual volition might have been other than it was. It is this consciousness which supplies the sting to most of our regrets and to all our repentance, and without which it would be mere mockery to grieve at the loss of an irreparable opportunity. We do, of course, find out post eventum, many mistakes, and we say: if only I had known that at the time! But when, reproaching ourselves, e.g., for yielding to a temptation, we say that we could have done otherwise, there is no such qualifying 'if' expressed or implied." These ideas have, of course, been given forth before by Martineau and many other ethical teachers, but the interesting and significant feature about the present utterance is that it proceeds from a thinker who was regarded as among the very ablest and most promising of Balliol's students, and whose mind has been thoroughly steeped in Oxford Hegelianism. At Balliol, Dr. Hoernlé had been taught that all the freedom that man needs can be got without accepting the existence of any open alternative; for that moral freedom really means no more than the power of self-determination, and that such self-determination involves no dual possibilities, but is always the necessary expression of the agent's dominant character at the moment of choice. This explanation of freedom and moral responsibility, which has been in vogue in the Oxford Colleges for nearly half-a-century, Dr. Hoernlé submits to searching criticism; and the conclusion he reaches is that self-determination, if it is not accompanied by the power of choice between equally possible modes of decision, is quite worthless for the adequate interpretation of our actual moral consciousness.

"Self-determination," he explains, "is a word of many meanings, and I have no wish to deny that some of them are valuable. For instance, as expressing that my actions are my own, and not the effects of some force other than my will, it is a useful corrective of theories of 'external' Determinism. But tested by the problem which I regard as central, self-determination is the problem itself rather than its solution. It depends on whether we are in earnest about the active sense of determinism. The self determines itself to action—this is a good enough description of the process of decision and selection amongst alternatives. But do its defenders understand the phrase as implying the possibility of acting otherwise? I doubt it. Certainly the phrase is not usually regarded in that light. And I think I am right in saying that most thinkers who identify freedom with self-determination would deny that it includes a freedom to act otherwise. In short, in all the so-called 'reconciliations' of freedom with Determinism, the latter gets the best of the bargain, in that it forces upon freedom its condition that possibilities shall be excluded. Self-determination is, from that point of view, merely a species of Determinism, working at bottom with the same conception of necessity, viz., the conception that the actual alone is necessary, and that nothing beside the actual is even possible. The self has determined itself to action and it could not have determined itself otherwise."

No doubt it is the ambiguity of this word "self-determination" which so often leads superficial readers to wrongly credit Green and other absolute idealists with a belief in the freedom of the will. In the course of his paper, Dr. Hoernlé carefully examines the argument from the principle of sufficient reason which in the view of the Hegelians, proves free choice to be impossible; and our impression is that he succeeds in showing that this argument is far from being conclusive. It is to be hoped that the Rev. R. J. Campbell will have his attention directed to this powerful article; for, if we mistake not, it presents a most effectual way of escape from that hopeless "antinomy" in which he confesses he is inevitably landed when he tries to reconcile his Oxford philosophy with his moral and religious consciousness. While "free-will" is thus ably represented in the Journal of Ethics, there is in Mind another striking paper which proceeds along the same libertarian line of thought. In this paper Dr. George Galloway, whose Studies in the Philosophy of Religion has been warmly appreciated by competent critics of different schools of thought, discusses at great length "The Idea of Development and its Application to History." In the course of his exposition, he necessarily encounters the question whether any portion of the historical process is rendered to some extent indeterminate through the possession of freedom of will by personal agents. His conclusion is, that we must admit the existence of some measure of real indeterminism, and he particularly insists on the circumstance, which Martineau also emphasises, that our moral decisions are not the necessary expressions of our character as a whole, but are the result of our free choice between the competing higher and lower principles in the character: "The diversity within character makes it possible that a man's act should always be related to some aspect of his character, and yet that there should be an element of indeterminism in his self-development. In the psychological problem we postulate the apperceptive activity and selective interest of the self as giving coherence to mental events; in the ethical problem we postulate the self as will which relates choice to some aspect of character, and which is the ultimate ground why, when there is conflict of motives, one aspect of character is expressed in action rather than another."

The admission into our two leading philosophical journals of such articles as Dr. Hoernlé's and Dr. Galloway's clearly shows that Mr. Bradley's contemptuous treatment of free-will is altogether out of accord with present facts. These facts, we believe, encourage the conviction that the time is not far distant when the doctrine of the freedom of man's will shall again have its fair share of advocacy in the class-rooms of our great universities; and when the Hegelian dogma that moral freedom means no more than the power of self-determination, and involves no open alternative in temptation between deciding for self and deciding for God, will no longer be accepted as a satisfactory explanation of that consciousness of personal responsibility which forms an essential and indestructible factor in man's moral and spiritual experience.

OBITUARY.

MR. RICHARD WADE.

MR. RICHARD WADE, of Rookwood, Stamford-road, Bowdon, died on Saturday, November 23. He was born in Manchester in January, 1829. His father being a Churchman and his mother a Wesleyan, he was baptized as an infant both at the Parish Church (now the Cathedral) and a Wesleyan chapel. During the forties, however, he became attracted to the Lower Mosley-street Schools, and subsequently to Cross-street Chapel. He was absent from Manchester from 1850 to 1855, but on his return identified himself again with both chapel and schools. At Lower Mosley-street, he became closely associated with various branches of work, and was held in high regard by his fellow-workers. He was active in the mutual improvement society, out of which the successful evening classes grew. He contributed interesting papers to a literary society which met in the Cross-street Chapel room. He was also a member of the Manchester Literary Club. In 1880, he published "The Rise of Nonconformity in Manchester, with a brief sketch of the history of Cross-street Chapel." This, which was very well and carefully done, grew out of papers read to the adult members of the Lower Mosley-street Sunday-school. During a considerable portion of his life, Mr. Wade had had some connection with newspaper work, and his style was clear and forcible.

He was in business for many years as partner with the late Mr. Robert Nicholson, and subsequently with Mr. Nicholson's sons, in "Grey Cloth," one of the staple Manchester industries. He finally retired from business six or seven years ago. Ten years since, he left Manchester, where he had lived since 1855, and took up his residence in Bowdon, becoming then a member of Dunham-road Chapel, Altrincham.

The interment took place at Hale Chapel on Wednesday, November 27, and many old friends were present to testify their esteem. The service was conducted by the Revs. Dendy Agate and A. Cobden Smith. Mr. Agate delivered an address, and also at the close of the sermon on Sunday morning at Dunham-road Chapel made reference in the following terms to the friend whom the congregation had lost; "He was never a man to thrust himself to the front; but behind his quiet and retiring manner there was a kindly spirit, loyal to principle, patient in well-doing, sustained by a sincere and simple religious faith. During his ten years' residence here, he worshipped regularly with us, until failing health began to tell upon him. Now his memory alone abides with us; and we bear our willing tribute to-day to one who did his earthly work with integrity, served the brethren as opportunity offered, and kept a trustful heart amid the manifold experiences of life. 'The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God, and there shall no torment touch them.'"

MR. EDWARD ALLEN.

To readers of this journal twenty years ago and upwards the initials of Mr. Edward Allen were well known. His contributions to our columns continued till he was nearly, if not quite, an octogenarian, and to the last they showed the marks of a cultivated mind and a generous heart. He belonged to a family connected with South-place Chapel, in Mr. W. J. Fox's time, and later with the New Gravel Pit Chapel, Hackney. He received a good education at the school, well known in former times, conducted in London Fields, Hackney, by Mrs. Clennell and her son, the late Mr. J. E. Clennell. But the best part of his education was derived from his life-long habits of reading and study. He was eminently a bookish man, and made himself acquainted with Latin, French, and Italian. In early life he travelled much in France, Norway, and other European countries, supporting himself by teaching English. At Havre, where he resided for a considerable time, he became intimately acquainted with the Protestant pastor, the late M. Fontané, who expressed a warm interest in his old friend when he was in London at the International Congress in 1901. On Mr. Allen's return from his travels, he received an appointment at the Trinity House, whence he finally retired on a small pension, competence enough for a bachelor of his simple and frugal habits. Thenceforward he gave himself wholly to literature, amongst his productions being an excellent book for children. His reviews for THE INQUIRER were the work of a careful and well-informed critic. Dealing frequently with religious, philosophical, and theological books, he was always thoughtful and discriminating, taking a line usually in advance of the position held by Unitarians of his own generation. His pen found graceful exercise also in occasional articles of a lighter, chatty type, probably there are readers still who remember the charm of his Christmas articles. Quietly humorous, quickly sympathetic, shy, and reserved, a lover of children, he grew old in a sequestered corner, known to few, but by that few genuinely respected and admired. He died at Dulwich, Nov. 21, in his 97th year.

The interment was at New Gravel Pit Chapel, Hackney, the Rev. H. Rawlings officiating.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

ENGLISH ARTISTS: IV.—TURNER.

LONGFELLOW once wrote these words:—

"Nature, the old nurse, took
The child upon her knee,
Saying 'Here is a story book
Thy father has written for thee.
Come, wander with me,' she said,
'Into regions yet untrod,
And read what is still unread
In the Manuscripts of God.'"

If ever a child was led by "the old Nurse," Nature, to love the works of God, and if ever an artist was gifted with the power to paint what he saw of those wonderful works, and to paint them so that we too should love the glories of sunshine and shower, of cloud and storm, that man was Turner, the landscape painter.

Great artists in earlier times painted landscapes too; look at Perugino's celebrated "blue" picture at the National Gallery, with its lovely distances and calm skies; and at the paintings of Titian, first of Venetian colourists; but you will see that these men and others contemporary with them, painted only fine weather, golden sunlight, and clear skies. Then go to look at Turner's pictures; you will see sunshine illuminating white mists, masses of cloud, effects of rain and snow storms, and soft hazy distances into which you feel sure you could wander far away. And Turner "wandered away" as soon as he was old enough to take walking tours through the country, carrying all he needed in a bundle at the end of his stick, sketching here and there as he went, and observing closely all that might serve him for his pictures.

Joseph Mallord William Turner, the great genius of English landscape painting, was the only child of a barber who lived near Covent-garden. He was born in 1775, and unhappily, for him, grew up without the wise care and tender guidance of a mother, though his father devoted himself as far as he was able to the solitary boy's education.

In a portrait of Turner, when about six years old, he is described as "a cheerful, nice looking child, with chestnut hair and blue eyes." There are scarcely any tales of his childhood, or of his having shown any remarkable artistic talent at an early age. The first time we hear of his drawing is when he was about seven. His father had taken him to the house of one of his customers, and the child, waiting whilst the barber pursued his calling, was much attracted by a coat of arms engraved on a silver salver. On returning home he drew two rampant lions in imitation of those he had seen, and the father appears to have decided at once that painting would be his son's profession. Turner is also reported to have drawn cocks and hens with a piece of chalk on a wall, when very young, and to have tinted some engravings with water colours for a man who gave him fourpence a picture. At another time he made little drawings, copied from engravings, and tinted them with his colours, and the father sold them in his shop for a shilling each.

Turner was not what we should now call well educated. He wrote and spelt incorrectly all his life; but his mind was set on one purpose, namely, to become a landscape painter, and as a means to this end he used his natural gifts of memory and observation, gathering up all that was useful for his art, and paying little attention to the studies which did not interest him. He worked under several masters before being sent to the Royal Academy Schools as a student, and one teacher of geometrical perspective sent him back to his father, saying he was too dull to learn and would never get on!

Through his years of studentship at the Royal Academy he continued to help towards keeping himself by colouring prints for engravers, washing in backgrounds for architects' designs, and by selling his own sketches amongst his father's customers. By the time he was five or six and twenty he was becoming well known as an artist. His whole life was spent in following the profession that was so dear to him, and he left more than twenty thousand pictures, and drawings, many of which belong to the nation.

Turner never married, but remained devoted to his father, who lived with him until his death in 1830. It is pleasant to remember that with increasing fame and prosperity the son never neglected the father, who through years of a hard-working and somewhat saddened life had done all in his power to help the boy who was his one joy and pride.

That Turner stands as the first and greatest of landscape painters is acknowledged by all lovers of art. The way to understand the wonderful beauty of his pictures is to see them again and again. We can only mention here four of the oil paintings in the "Turner" room at the National Gallery.

"Agrippina landing with the ashes of Germanicus," is one of the most marvellous pictures ever painted. The longer we look at it the more it seems to shimmer and glow with transparent light. The pale blue of the sky is partly covered with light clouds; the distant buildings, from the effect of sunlight, appear to be bathed in pale yellow and rosy tints; the reflections in the river are deep red and purple. Over the foreground on the right hand side of the painting, and through the arches of the bridge, are trails of blue-grey mist; and over all the scene is that luminous haze that only Turner could paint.

"Rain, Steam, and Speed." In this picture a train is rushing forward out of the mist and storm. It is travelling over a bridge at the moment when a sudden shower of rain on a bright day blots out the landscape and fills the air with hissing white drops, just as one may often see it when taking a journey. Turner is the only artist who not only could see and paint the effect of the rain, but who transformed even the heavy lumbering train into something mysterious and beautiful.

In "The Burial of Wilkie" a tall dark ship is slowly and majestically moving along on a still, cool sea. The water is so smooth that the ship is reflected in it as if sailing on an unruffled lake.

In the "Chichester Canal" the perspective is so perfect that it seems as if one could really travel along that quiet waterway towards the sunset. Far away, in the distance, is a ship, and there is nothing to disturb the serenity and peace of this beautiful picture of a closing day.

IDEALISM AND RELIGION.

IN the current number of the Contemporary Review, Professor HENRY JONES concludes his vigorous reply to the criticisms of Mr. L. T. HOBBHOUSE on the subject of "Idealism and Politics," and incidentally describes the general position, as to morals and religion, of the Idealism for which he pleads with so much ardour.

"This form of Idealism," he declares, "is a strenuous and uncompromising Monism. It would derive all things from a spiritual principle. Nevertheless, it appears to be compacted together of elements ordinarily regarded as irreconcilable. It is distinguished from all other systems of philosophy by the resistance it offers to the suppression of opposition: it would maintain contraries in all their right, and seeks to reconcile them. In all that it attempts to do it would show that differences are as original and significant as unity. Hence, it repudiates the starting point, and rejects the whole process and method of other theories. It will begin neither from an atomic hypothesis—whether these be 'atoms,' or monads, or 'persons'—nor from its opposite. Neither particulars nor universals, neither the One nor the Many will serve its purpose. Its starting point, as well as its final goal, is the conception of 'system,' that is to say, of Unity of differences, or a One in the Many."

There is a certain fascination for an ordinary mind, innocent of the logic and the language of the Schools, in attempting to understand what is meant by such a statement as this. How it works out in the field of practical politics we may see from the close of the article, which contains a noble tribute to the teaching and influence of T. H. Green; and in Professor JONES's exposition of the way in which this Idealism harmonises what is generally regarded as the conflict between Individualism and Socialism. "Idealism," he says, "is content neither with public order not with private freedom; it will neither make the State subordinate to the individual, nor the individual to the State; it is neither Socialism nor Individualism. Yet it will curtail none of the rights of either. It will even make the evolution of the one depend upon the evolution of the other, and, in its account of progress, deepen the significance of both the State and the individual." And in a further passage we read: "The a priori fear of Individualism passes away, like the a priori fear of Socialism. We should not deem it necessary to abolish private property, or to limit individual enterprise, or to abolish competition, or otherwise to turn the citizens of the ideal State into blameless sheep, fed, herded, and shorn by a power not themselves, and not making for righteousness. We can give the individual a firmer standing in the State, place better industrial weapons in his hands, if he can wield them, bid him contend to the uttermost, and expect thereby a stronger State with stronger, freer, and therefore more loyal citizens. . . . The best State is that which both does most for the individual and enables him to do most for himself. The most free individual and the best servant of himself is the man who, whether as capitalist or labourer, as lord or peasant, as theoretical thinker or merchant prince, contributes most of the article he happens to produce, and thereby best meets the wants of his neighbours and best uses his station to serve the State."

The essential fact in all this teaching is that the whole of life is interpreted in terms of "spirit." Idealism is indeed only a theory "at best only in process of being proved." It is "a principle of research in knowledge, and of reform in private and public conduct. Idealism would follow the self-articulation of spirit in the history of beliefs and institutions." "Its task is only begun. It is no complete theory." But it is found to work, and to give confidence to men in all the higher aspects of life. It helps a man "to understand himself, and make of his world a home in which his intelligence may find some order and peace."

It is here that we are brought to question most closely what is actually meant by "the One in the Many" of this Idealism.

"God is immanent in the universe," says Professor JONES, "the very substance and truth of all finite being; and yet finite being is all the more real and independent on that account. Idealism would maintain both religion and morality in all their rights. It trusts both the goodness and the power of God to the full, and will have nothing anywhere go wrong in the long run; and yet, knowing the evil of man's heart and how finitude infects his world, there is nothing that has not to be set right. Nay, Idealism plants its contradictions at the heart of both religion and morality. Religion, it holds, implies that the ideal, its God, is eternally real, and at the same time that the consciousness of God has to be realised in the human spirit, and that God Himself is present in the process. Morality, it maintains, postulates a good that is absolute, an ideal which alone is in the full sense real; and yet it represents the good as in course of being attained, real only while in process, and the process as endless." Is it true, the plain man asks, that amid such contradictions the human mind does actually find order and peace? Is there here that in which he can rest, as in the Eternal, and from the centre of that rest have a confident strength to be doing the will of the Eternal?

The crux, as it seems to us, is in the words: Religion implies that the ideal, its God, is eternally real, and at the same time that the consciousness of God has to be realised in the human spirit. Does that mean that the Idealist's God is simply "the ideal," an abstract goodness which we in our unfolding experience of life conceive and aspire after, and that apart from our personal experience it has no subsistence in the One Eternal Source of all? And is all the consciousness of God there is that which is realised in the human spirit; so that to speak of God's consciousness apart from our human consciousness would be to use words answering to no reality? It is, perhaps, the failure to grasp the whole of Professor JONES's meaning which renders such questions possible, but that is how much of the idealist language about religion affects us.

Certainly, it appears to us that the only assured peace which men can find in religion is in the conviction that their own spiritual experience, as finite beings, in process of growth, implies that the "One in the Many" is also the One over all, "God blessed for ever"; and that He is not only immanent in His world, in all those inspiring ways which Professor JONES so eloquently describes, but transcendent also. It is for us that goodness is for ever in process, faced by evil to be overcome; and because we know what that means, and are absolutely sure that the good must triumph, we have that deep conviction: "God's in His heaven; all's right with the world." We have it only when we are in the battle, making it all right, just where we are. But in the very fact of that experience there comes to us also the triumphant conviction that we are with that Other, the One who is Eternal Goodness, that God is real, that there is over all the storm and conflict an ineffable peace, out of the heart of which, overflowing with love and joy, comes to us the Power, which makes for righteousness. In His strength we are strong and confident and calm. Ours is a peace which cannot be destroyed, even when we realise what is meant by the agony of the cross. We are in our Father's hands, and with all humility and joy can make our lives a prayer that His will may be done.

BOSTON INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS.

THE RELATION OF CHRISTIANITY TO RELIGION.

BY THE REV. C. J. STREET, M.A., LL.B.

TIME was, and that not so long ago, when a title such as I have announced would have been hailed with derision by most Christian people.

I can well remember when it was the fashion to classify "religions," as they were called, into "true" and "false," Christianity being regarded as the only true religion, and all the rest as false. The contemptuous pity then expressed for the "heathen" was offensive and ungenerous, utterly unworthy of the spirit shown by the Master and the best of his apostles in dealing with the religious susceptibilities of people who thought not quite as they did. The rebuke to the impetuous Sons of Thunder who wished to call down fire from heaven to consume the unfriendly Samaritans, and tried to stop the good work of casting out evil spirits because it was being done by one who "followeth not with us," needed frequent repetition in those days—and it is not wholly unneeded now—"Forbid him not; for he that is not against you is for you." "Ye judge after the flesh; I judge no man." The narrowness of Peter, before his soul was awakened, found many imitators, but not the catholic spirit of the enlightened Peter who had gained grace to say: "God hath showed me that I should not call any man common or unclean. Of a truth, I perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness is accepted with Him." And the broad-minded oration of the Apostle to the Gentiles on Mars Hill might never have been spoken, so far as the effect on the average Christian conscience was concerned—"God that made the world and all things therein, He, being Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is He served by men's hands as though He needed anything, seeing He Himself giveth to all life and breath and all things; and He made of one every nation of men to dwell on all the face of the earth, having determined their appointed seasons and the bounds of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after Him, and find Him, though He be not far from every one of us; for in Him we live and move and have our being; as certain of your own poets have said, For we are also His offspring."

But the days of that old and objectionable narrowness and spiritual conceit (which is the worst of all conceits) are past—gone, I trust, for ever from intelligent Christianity; and there is better promise to-day of a return to the pure and unadulterated gospel of Jesus Christ than in any of the generations gone by. All that is good and true in the "New Theology" is old as Christianity itself, and what is mistaken and foolish will pass away like all kindred errors have done. But meanwhile, let us welcome every bold and earnest prophet, however we may differ from some of his teaching, so long as he proclaims the Immanent God, and helps to make humanity conscious of its essential divinity.

A Christianity like that of Jesus so abounds in charity and sympathetic understanding of the greatness of truth and the varied wants of human hearts that no admonition as to tolerance is necessary. The more clearly we know, the less we shall criticise, and the deeper will be our understanding. But a narrower Christianity sometimes meets with a deserved, if gentle, rebuke from one whom it may regard as a Sceptic or Agnostic—as when, e.g., Mr. John Morley writes:—

"Tolerance is far more than the abandonment of civil usurpations over conscience. It is a lesson often needed quite as much in the hearts of a minority as of a majority. Tolerance means reverence for all the possibilities of Truth; it means acknowledgment that she dwells in diverse mansions, and wears vesture of many colours, and speaks in strange tongues; it means frank respect for freedom of indwelling conscience against mechanic forms, official conventions, social force; it means the charity that is greater than even faith and hope."

What is it that has made such a sweeping change in the bearing of the thoughtful portion of the Christian Church toward the non-Christian manifestations of the religious spirit? Many causes have undoubtedly contributed to this cheering and satisfactory result. There has been much natural growth and development from within. The essential spirit of Christianity has asserted itself as against all denominationalisms and ecclesiasticisms and made thinking men understand that all humanity is one, and that the Father is always seeking His children in order that He may save them. But the chief factor making for this better state of things has been the wealth of new knowledge about the faith of other peoples which has been poured upon us—knowledge whose credentials are unimpeachable, coming as it does from close study given by sympathetic and scholarly minds, dealing with facts in a purely scientific spirit, and anxious only to ascertain and announce the truth. For the first time it has been possible, and is now being generally found by thoughtful students to be desirable, to apply scientific methods and tests to the problems of religious phenomena as they are presented in countless phases and forms all the world over. Thus has grown up the science of Comparative Religion, and it has become practicable, and most interesting and illuminating, to study the various manifestations of the religious spirit together, enabling us to judge as never before of the degrees of merit in the different systems of faith which humanity has upreared, and to discern an underlying unity which the dust of the strife of sectarians has hitherto obscured.

One thing has been made perfectly clear by this new knowledge and the scientific application of it—viz., that Christianity is one thing, and Religion is something larger and more comprehensive. It is no longer possible for the thoughtful man, however devout a Christian he may be, to say or to think that the terms "Christianity" and "Religion" are synonymous and co-extensive. He cannot refuse to see that much precious Religion exists outside of the Christian circle of influence. He cannot any longer divide "religions" into

"true" and "false," for he sees that there is and must be truth in all. He cannot even speak, except carelessly, of "religions" at all, for he has learnt the great and liberalising truth that Religion is One, though its manifestations and expressions are full of variety. He has come to see that the Church of God is greater than all the Churches, stands high above their dogmatisms and half-truths, comprehends them all in spite of their arbitrary dividing lines, and even includes multitudes whom they have ignored or cast out.

The Church which is truly Catholic comprehends every earnest worshipper, and excludes no manifestation of reverence, whatever intellectual shape it may assume. The spirit of the Living God can never be restrained within ecclesiastical demarcations; wherever the human spirit reaches out in aspiration and devoutness a ready response of the Divine Nature is found.

I find it easier to define Christianity to my own satisfaction than to define Religion, which is, perhaps, natural. It is the larger truths that are hardest to summarise in a phrase. The nearer they approach infinity the less possible is it for them to be defined. Christianity is a particular manifestation of the religious spirit which is common to all mankind. It may be simply and fairly defined, I think, as "the religion of Jesus."

But when it comes to defining Religion, the real difficulty begins. How many books have I opened in hope for guidance in this matter, only to turn away unsatisfied and disappointed! How many great teachers to whom one looks with affection or reverence, have failed completely in this respect! Religion is "those perceptions of the Infinite which are able to influence the moral character of man," says Max Müller. According to Frances Power Cobbe, it is "the sense of absolute dependence, united with the sense of absolute moral allegiance; the Being on whom we depend being recognised as possessing the Right to claim, as well as the Power to enforce, our absolute obedience." "By Religion," says Martineau, "I understand the belief and worship of Supreme Mind and Will, directing the Universe, and holding moral relations with life." "The religious element first manifests itself in our consciousness by a feeling of need, of want; in one word, by a sense of dependence," says Theodore Parker, who, at the outset of his ministry, wrote: "I determined to preach nothing as Religion which I had not experienced inwardly and made my own, knowing it by heart." "Religion," says Professor Flint, "is man's communion with what he believes to be a god or gods; his sense of relationship to and dependence on a higher and mysterious agency, with all the thoughts, emotions, and actions which proceed therefrom." Count D'Alviella defines it as "the conception man forms of his relations with the superhuman and mysterious powers on which he believes himself to depend." "Religion," says Bishop Creighton, "means the knowledge of our destiny and of the means of fulfilling it." Professor Bradley, in his Gifford Lectures last February, said: "It is an attitude or activity of the whole soul or personality, containing a mode of belief about God and about the self and the world in our relation to Him, a mode of feeling concerning Him, a direction of the will towards Him, or a union of the will with His will—no one of these alone or merely side by side with the others.” “Religion,” says Dr. Minot Savage, “is the search for the secret of life.”

None of these definitions satisfy me. My own statement of the case usually is that Religion is the reaching out of man's spirit to God, the connecting link between earth and heaven. But I realise the inadequacy of the definition. The one which really commends itself to me as the most poetical and beautiful is that given at the very end of H. Fielding Hall's remarkable book, “The Hearts of Men”—“Religion is the music of the Infinite echoed from the hearts of men.”

The fact of man's religious tendency is a necessary corollary of his divine origin; the method and extent of its development depend chiefly on nationality and age. The American, like the Englishman, is born to be a Christian, the Turk or Arab to be a Mohammedan, the Burmese to be a Buddhist. Parsee and Jew, Brahman and Shintoist, are such because their conditions have made them what they are. But each expresses religion in his own way; and, whatever his form of faith, his fervour and zeal, his sincerity and devoutness are equally manifest. A man's religion is his most priceless possession. There is nothing he will not sacrifice for it when it has got a real hold of him. There is a strong enthusiasm felt somewhere for every form of religion; and the strange thing is that the enthusiasm of one phase of it usually scorns the enthusiasm of every other.

All religion comes to meet a deep human need; it springs from the foundations of the heart, and wells up in strong waves of feeling. When religious susceptibilities are touched, all is emotion—a sufficient warning that Reason alone, invaluable gift of God as it is, is not enough to meet human needs. Religion may be divorced from Reason—and, alas! it often is; but unspeakably beautiful is the perfect combination and harmony of Reason and Emotion, blending in perfect expression of the deepest wants of the soul. Faiths are built up from feeling, but they need to be guided and controlled by intelligence before they can stand the test of true worth. There is no such stimulus to life as Religion. It intensifies a man's power over himself and over others. It transforms and dignifies the whole nature.

It is clear gain when our minds are sufficiently broadened to enable us to realise that no religion is false, however inadequate it may seem to us; that no idolatry in itself is wicked, but simply an incomplete and childish attempt to express the worshipping spirit; that no doctrine of theology is untrue—merely an imperfect guess at the truth. Our own favourite doctrines are nothing more; and never a man was born who knew, or could know, the whole truth of God. Some of our worship is perchance idolatry too; certainly it would seem so to men who approach God in other ways. The religion which we love with all our hearts appears to earnest and thoughtful men, born and reared under other influences, to be pernicious and fatally false; yet we know that it is not so, any more than their own faith is without beauty and truth to support it. “Every religion,” says Max Müller, “even the most imperfect and degraded, has something that ought to be sacred to us; for there is in all religions a secret yearning after the true, though unknown, God. Whether we see the Papuan squatting in dumb meditation before his fetish, or whether we listen to Ferdushi exclaiming: ‘The height and the depth of the whole world have their centre in Thee, O my God; I do not know Thee what Thou art, but I know that Thou art what Thou alone canst be,’ we ought to feel that the place whereon we stand is holy ground.”

It is simply a question of degree between one form of faith and another, between one phase of religion and another, and each must stand the fair test of comparison. Jesus must be measured with the founders of other world-systems; our Bible must take its place beside the other Bibles of the world; the best will plead its own cause. No thunder-voice from Sinai is necessary to proclaim “This is the Word of God”; if it is a divine word, it will speak for itself and make its influence felt. No mighty miracle is needed to proclaim the divine appointment and commission of the prophet: his preaching will make it plain. The Saviour of the world requires no herald angels; he will save—the best proof of his divine warrant.

Only in full and open comparison with other faiths will the beauty of the best appear. Whosoever is convinced of the supreme dignity of his own Lord and Master need fear no rivalry with any other; rather will he court comparison. Indeed, between the founders and leaders of faith there would and could be no rivalry; they were each developing the best thought and life of their own age and race. The rivalry has arisen among the disciples, unable to rise to the height of their Master's spiritual teaching, and diverting attention from the things that really matter to the things that are of little moment. The true value of a Religion, or a Bible, or a Christ, will only emerge when they are honestly compared with all other claimants for our regard and veneration.

No, the conflicts and jealousies have not been among the Masters, but among the followers, who have too often been mere camp-followers. Men have wrangled about Religion, and lost hold of the religious spirit in doing so. They have eagerly cast each other out of the synagogue, and denied to the heathen and the heretic the very name of Religion; but their foolish and bigoted denials have not altered facts. There is, after all, but One Religion, and that is the upward striving of the human soul towards the Divine, whether it recognises it to be such or not. There is much unconscious religion in the world, happily. Perhaps the more unconscious it is the better; it will not be spoilt by self-laudation. The manifestations of that Divine Leading which we term Religion are innumerable, and boundless in variety.

Surely it gives us a higher view of God when we are generous (or shall we say just and sensible?) enough to realise this larger truth. Is it not glorious gain to feel that no age or race has been left without contact and communion with the Most High? The vision has been proportioned to the capacity for sight; the word has been appropriate to the immediate need. James Russell Lowell most aptly expresses the great truth which the science of Comparative Religion is making clear to the world when he says:—

“God sends His teachers unto every age,
To every clime, and every race of men,
With revelations fitted for their growth
And shape of mind; nor gives the realm of truth

Into the selfish rule of one sole race.

Therefore, each form of worship that hath swayed

The life of man, and given it to grasp

The master-key of knowledge, Reverence,

Enfolds some germs of goodness and of right;

Else, never had the eager soul, which loathes

The slothful down of pampered ignorance

Found in it even a moment's fitful rest.”

There is not less devoutness among the Brahmans or Mohammedans than we can find in our companies of Christian believers; does God think less of their worship and reverence than of ours? The Ethical Theism of the Jew is as firm and strong to-day as it was in the splendid prophets who redeemed his race from mere ceremonialism and lip-service; is it less acceptable to the Infinite Goodness than the tribute of virtue and service offered in the name of Christ? Naturally, we love our own best; we believe our own faith to be the highest possible, or we should not hold it, but we must be appreciative and sympathetic to the spiritual strivings of others who are no less sincere than we endeavour to be.

What matters it that some faiths seem still to be in their infancy or early childhood? It is a phase through which the highest and best-developed have had to pass before they attained to the glory of full-grown manhood. All religion probably began in fear, displaying itself first in a desire to placate the higher powers, to get them on the side of the worshipper rather than against him. What then? “The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom,” and only the beginning. It was a child's motive that swayed the primitive worshipper, no doubt; it is often no more than a child's motive which prompts the Christian worshipper to-day. But the child will become a man, and put away childish things; and we shall not help his development by sneering at him, or chiding him, or turning him out of the worshipping assembly, or refusing to accept his tribute as religion at all. Not such was the attitude of Jesus, nor is it the right attitude for his modern disciples, who have the less excuse for narrowness because to them an ampler knowledge of God has been vouchsafed. God is revealing Himself to our generation as never before. The pity of it if we will not accept the vision and understand the majestic truth that He is, and has ever been, within the heart and life of all His humanity!

And a higher and truer view of Humanity itself comes to us when, in view of the facts presented by the study of Comparative

Religion, we come to see that Man, always and everywhere, is the child of God, dear to the Father's heart, and with a spark of heavenly fire within. All through the history of mankind there has been the Divine appeal; and gradually, with growing appreciation of its mystic meaning, has come the human response. The Divine Nature unceasingly calls to that which in rising man is akin to itself. Human Nature, very slowly and in stumbling fashion, learns its opportunity and ability, and painfully reaches up to the Divine. And so the story of the world is written, "a blundering quest for God," if you will, but not in the sense in which Mr. R. J. Campbell used the phrase; a progressive development of human power and possibility, a nearer approach to the Divine intention and will. Religion is the impelling power, the stimulus, the kindling fire. And, as F. W. Newman wisely said, "True religion wages no abstract war against any part of man, but gives to each part its due subordination or supremacy, and breathes sweetness and purity through all."

Christianity itself becomes a richer, larger, more generous thing when this more cosmopolitan view of religion is taken. The latest census of the British Empire indicates that King Edward has in Asia more than 300 millions of subjects, in America $7\frac{1}{2}$ millions, in Africa about 43 millions, in Australasia over 5 millions, and in Europe over 42 millions. Classifying these broadly as regards religious faith, there are only 58 millions of Christians in the King's dominions, as against 208 millions of Hindoos, 94 millions of Mohammedans, 12 millions of Buddhists, and 23 millions of Parsees, Jews, and others, including some very primitive manifestations of the religious spirit. That is to say, that only one in seven British subjects is Christian of any kind.

These figures may be open to some challenge, but they are not likely to be very seriously wrong, and they should give us pause for reflection. After personal contact with the cultured and devout Hindoo or Moslem, and too frequent and painful association with shallow dogmatists who take the Christian name, but seldom use their brains to think or their hearts to be charitable, it ceases to be a wonder that the contemplative Hindoo is repelled by the ignorant claims and practices of an offensive Christianity, or that the sober and honest Turk is disgusted with the unworthy Christians of the Levant. Of course, it is not the Christianity that is to blame for this unfortunate repulsion, but the shameful perversion of Christianity which is made into a constant object-lesson for them. So, we are not to judge the religion of the Koran or of the Vedas by the degenerate types often presented to us. Each form of religion must be judged by its best expression; and then it is wonderful—soul-piercing—how much alike they are in the great essentials. There is more community of thought and spirit between the best of Christianity and the best of Islam or Buddhism than between the best and worst of Christianity. There is more sympathy between the authors of "Contentio Veritatis" and the leaders of the Brahmo Samaj of India than between them and the devotees of the debased superstition of the Greek Church. Ram-mohun Roy and Ramakrishna, Keshub Chunder Sen and Protap Chunder Mozoomdar are nearer in faith and feeling to any Liberal Christian than is the head of a Jesuit College or the Catholikos of the Armenian Church or even the humble Plymouth Brother. We must not be the deluded creatures of a name.

This comprehensiveness of view, this generosity of recognition of Religion as the human attempt to reach the Divine, will not interfere with our private interpretation of the great principles for which historic Christianity has stood, or diminish our loyalty to it in the least. But the principles will be amplified beyond our earlier thought; we shall see that our faith was greater than we knew. Do you ask, Where is the place left for Revelation? Ask, rather, where that place is not. God has always been revealing Himself to those who were able to see the marks of His presence. Has inspiration gone, do you ask? Have you not learnt that it began when man was yet in his infancy, and will remain as a growing influence through the whole of his adult life? What becomes of the Incarnation, think you? Does the Divine Indwelling in Jesus then become any the less true or significant if you also admit that God was in Buddha, and Zoroaster, and in the Bab, and that His Spirit is present to a greater or less extent in us all? Does not the larger outlook make it seem more than ever true that we are the temple of the Living God, that the Spirit of God dwelleth in us, and that the temple of God is holy, which temple we are?

Religion is no private demesne, but a public garden, wherein every man may walk freely, gather rosebuds that will not wither, and taste of fruits neither forbidden nor disappointing. Christianity, as it was in Jesus, is the choicest portion of that wonderful garden, where the sun shines brightest and the flowers smell sweetest. Yet every avenue leads to some desirable goal; every meadow attracts some straying foot; every bank has its restful invitation, every tree its meed of welcome shade. Throughout the garden the loving care and touch of the great Master Gardener are everywhere seen, and His welcome is felt by each timid visitant wherever he may wander. And the heart of every honoured and understanding guest beats responsive to that of his Master. In His name an ungrudging greeting is given to all who from the dusty highways and busy thoroughfares of worldly life find entrance into the grateful garden of the Lord.

SERVICES AT FOREST HILL.

SIR,—The L. D. U. S. contemplates a series of services at Forest Hill, commencing January 12, 1908. May we appeal, through you, to all friends of Liberal religion in that neighbourhood to put themselves in communication with either of the undersigned, with a view to a preliminary meeting or conference.

GEORGE CRITCHLEY,

E. SAVELL HICKS,

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

IF you start from Acqua to climb the Lüer Berg, but jib at the steep bit above the little stall called Runc, your natural course is to cross the tobel on stepping-stones and follow the fairly level track north-west. This brings you before long into a long, narrow, turfy clearing, something like a green drive in Epping Chase, but much more like the secret way to Garde Perilous in the forest Peu Rassurant. Turn off at a certain place—I shall give you no clue to it, lest inquisitive tourist

Hunt it, and make it a lion, and get it at last into guide-books—and you are soon within the most romantic little dell in the wide, wide world. Once in the bluest of blue moons it is the bed of a torrent, and therefore it is wildly carved, and caved and rock-bestrewn and mossy; but when the moon is a normal colour no water can enter it, any more than the charmed punch-bowl, and therefore it is dry. If I had been Ovidius Naso I should not have housed the siesta-god in a Cimmerian cave, but in a certain deep nook of this dell. The stream has heaped great stones together to make a couch, and upholstered it with thick, soft moss, from which the instinctive ant, mindful of blue moons, holdeth aloof.

"This by the slumberous god himself is pressed,

With all his limbs relaxed in languid rest."

If you join him, you see the brightest and hottest summer sun through a thick lattice of larch boughs. The breeze sings to you through their crowns of glowing cones, the great bee drones a bass to it, millions of grasshoppers and crickets are making ado beyond the ridge. Everything whispers, "Sleep, my pretty one, sleep."

The natural preface to slumber is a newspaper. So I return Hudibras to my pocket, unfold a record of contemporary history, and read: "At the close of the Alpha Union meeting the Rev. R. J. Campbell called attention to the hard case of young ministers who have been driven from their pulpits for preaching the New Theology, contrary to their trust-deeds. Mr. Allanson Picton proposed the establishment of a fund for their assistance."

Whereupon "I had a dream, which was not all a dream." Somnus is a muddle-headed deity. His memory runs after this fashion:

"The sun's eye had a sickly glare,
The moon with age was wan;
The skeletons of nations were Around that lonely man.
Yet beautiful and bright he stood
As born to rule the storm,
A creature not too bright and good
For human nature's daily food,
A proud though child-like form."

A mere towzled shuffle-brain is this god; and that explains what happened. For what has the Puritan hero's unwillingness to abide by his engagement to do with that of the New Theologians to abide by theirs? The things are, of course, quite different. The one had reference to a whipping, the other to the use of particular pulpits for the preaching of particular doctrines. There is really no comparison.

On a neighbouring stone sat the theological knight of the whey and orange beard, who could not ope

His mouth but out there flew a trope ; and face-to-face with him was his trusty Ralpho,

"Whose knowledge was not far behind
The Knight's, but of another kind,
And he another way came by 't :
Some call it gifts, and some new-light."

Close behind this interesting pair stood a figure in a Geneva gown, engaged in animated talk with the Secretary of State for India. Each of them had a book in his left hand, and occasionally thumped it with his right. The one volume was lettered, so far as I could see, "...
Theology," the other "An Essay on Compr..." The worst of it was that, with two conversations going on at once, I could only catch ill-assorted scraps of each, oddly and irrelevantly intermixed.

"My point," the Secretary was saying,
"is an ethical one. I do not object to your views—that is, I do not object to your holding them and preaching them ; but I do object to your doing so in defiance of a signed pledge to the contrary. You have not yet resigned your pulpit. Is it, or is it not, held on a Westminster Confession tenure ?"

Unfortunately, Ralpho raised his voice in this place, so that the first part of the Geneva gown's reply was lost. Quoth the squire :

"But saints whom oaths and vows oblige
Know little of their privilege.
Some to the glory of the Lord Perjured themselves, and broke their word :

And this the constant rule and practice
Of all our late apostles' acts is.
Was not the cause at first begun
With perjury, and carried on ?"

Here Geneva waxed emphatic, and I was able to follow his words. "The doctrines of the Westminster Confession are horrible —horrible ! I tell you, sir, I detest them.
When I signed—merely as a formality : it was a necessary legal condition towards the acceptance of my pulpit—when I signed a declaration of assent to such doctrines, you do not suppose that I really did assent ? We do not sign in a literal sense, I assure you."

The tones of Ralpho became predominant again, and his remarks were as unpleasant as before :

"That saints may claim a dispensation
To swear and forswear on occasion
I doubt not but it will appear
With pregnant light. The point is clear.
Oaths are but words, and words but wind,

Too feeble instruments to bind.
It follows, though the thing be forgery
And false, th' affirm, it is no perjury,
But a mere ceremony, and a breach Of nothing but a form of speech."

The Knight's reply was so much interrupted by the Secretary's simultaneous utterances that I only caught a few stray phrases of it, such as—

"All this is true,

Yet 'tis not fit that all men knew ;"
and—

"Such as the learned Jesuits use," before Mr. Secretary's voice overpowered
it :

"This doctrine of mental reserve is a dangerous weapon. It means, in plain words, that your signature to a definite undertaking is never binding if at the moment of signing you do not intend to keep it. Where is there any logical limit to its application ? A blank atheist may be archbishop, a rank traitor may take an oath of allegiance ; no business man need dream of keeping his part in a bad bargain

—if only he signed it in a non-literal sense."

"Pardon me," said Geneva, "an ordinary civil contract is quite a different matter. It is absolutely necessary to social order that these should be made legally binding."

"Just so. Business could not go on, the whole modern money system would break down, if that rule were relaxed.
But we were talking of ethics, not of law.
Are the ordinances of God less strict than those of Mammon ?"

"I repeat," said Geneva, "that you are confusing two quite different matters.
We cannot apply similar rules to the two cases."

"Well," said the Secretary, "it seems to plain men like me that, although we ought at all times to speak, write, and sign nothing but the truth, and to keep our promises, yet ought we most chiefly so to do when we are dealing with divine truth and worship—"

Ralpho the irrepressible was heard again :

"But they are weak, and little know
What free-born consciences may do.
'Tis the temptation of the devil
That makes all human actions evil ;
For saints may do the same things by
The spirit, in sincerity,
Which other men are tempted to,
And at the devil's instance do.
And yet that thing that's pious in
The one, in th' other is a sin.
Is't not ridiculous, and nonsense,
A saint should be a slave to conscience ?"

"The real test," Geneva was now heard to say, "is that of the public advantage.
Which is better—or, rather, which is worse—that I should sign a declaration of assent when in fact I do not assent, or that I should lose my position of advantage and the ear of the public ?"

I had not heard what Ralpho was urging at the same time, but I did hear the beginning of Sir Hudibras' reply :

"These reasons may perhaps look oddly
To the wicked, though they evince the godly—"

The thump of a larch-cone on my pillow of moss startled me, and I was alone. I heard the voice of a bumble-bee, instead of the knight's that wooed the widow.
Of those duetting rooks, which played Geneva gown, and which was the Secretary bird ? As for Ralpho, I looked round in vain for his representative. His voice was indeed too harsh for a woodland sound.
Is it possible that I could have been— ?
An unpleasant idea ; but I deserve it for confusing, even in a dream, the Puritans of the Commonwealth with the New Theologians of to-day.

E. W. LUMMIS.

[On the serious side of this amusing piece of per-iffage we ought to say that in our friend's dream the minister of the City Temple is hardly represented in a fair light. We do not believe that he has ever been called upon to sign or signify in any way assent to the doctrines of the Westminster Confession as a condition of his acceptance of the pulpit, but, on the contrary, in the frankest way disavowed responsibility or its terms. At the same time, the existence of that strictly doctrinal trust, to which neither minister nor people can really conform, is an extremely awkward fact, and to the unbiassed conscience it appears to involve a moral situation which should be felt to be intolerable.

It appears to us that in all such cases, where there is a creed-bound church, and a people who really believe in spiritual freedom, they or their trustees ought to go to Parliament for relief.—ED. INQ.]

CORRESPONDENCE.

OUR CHURCHES AND THEIR WORK.

SIR,—Mr. Vaughan will do well to guard against the dangers of the argumentum a silentio. In my previous letter I had no intention of discussing the large question which he introduced at Northampton.
I merely wished to correct what, to me, seemed, and, I must add, still seems, an unjust impression conveyed by his references to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the National Conference.

In the generous fervour of his enthusiasm —which we must all respect—Mr. Vaughan is less accurate than might be desired in stating a view with which he is unable to sympathise. He speaks of "the Conference ideal of bare freedom," of "the abstract chimera of bare freedom without positive aims," of "the negative freedom ideal" (the Italics are mine). Where did he find these phrases ? I, at any rate, repudiate them as heartily as he himself does, nor do I feel the least concern for a freedom which is not a living principle of both thought and life.

Mr. Vaughan says, "I question the truth of the Conference letter." Well, that is plain, not to say, blunt, speaking ; but perhaps it is less serious than it looks.
For Mr. Vaughan uses words in a sense of his own. I quite agree with him that "doctrine is the necessary intellectual form of religion," that all religion implies belief of some kind. But in the ordinary use of language, there is a wide difference between "belief" and "creed." Belief of some kind is essential to religion : creeds have generally been the foes to religions.
The Fellows of the Royal Society, by the very fact of being such, declare their belief in science ; but they would indignantly reject the statement that they have a creed.

Again, it is perfectly true that for us, as for others, there must be sympathy and agreement about fundamentals among people who are to unite with advantage for religious worship and work. But in practice it makes all the difference whether, on the one hand, the amount and kind of this agreement is defined, and, as it were, imposed ab extra, or, on the other, is left to each member to settle for himself. I have always understood that it was the great and distinctive privilege of our churches that they are free from all tests except those which each member applies for and to himself. If a minister changes his convictions and so gets out of harmony with his people, he naturally leaves them, without any just feeling of grievance, though there may be regret on both sides: if, on the other hand, his people are in sympathy with him in his change, their relation remains undisturbed. In this way, gradual, but in the aggregate, substantial modifications of opinion have taken place in our congregations without trouble, even within my own recollection. The same process, operating over a much longer period, accounts for the spiritual affinity, with profound theological differences, between Baxter and Martineau.

Mr. Vaughan will not allow that there is room for difference of opinion as to the relative value of "protest" with regard to doctrines which we reject. Protest, he says, "is a poisonous delusion which blights all our missionary efforts." Whether poisonous or not, it is pretty ancient. Mr. Vaughan appeals to "the missionary method of our Master." What about the warning against "the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees," and the something more than warning and protest in Matt. xxiii., &c.? St. Paul is generally looked upon as a missionary of importance, but an expurgated edition of his epistles, in which references to those of the circumcision and other opponents were cut out, would be more curious than enlightening. Mr. Vaughan quotes a characteristic passage from Dr. Martineau: "We should turn our attention not to orthodoxy, which has a faith and is satisfied with it, but to indifference, and unbelief, and sin, which have it not, and are satisfied without it. On these we should make aggression in the power of a positive religion." Most true, and admirably put. This was written in 1838. But in 1839 Martineau himself was in the thick of the famous Liverpool controversy, his contributions to which were, I need hardly say, remarkable alike for dignity of temper and keenness of intellect, suffused throughout with deep devotion to truth and the God of truth. Here are the subjects of his lectures: "The Bible: what it is, and what it is not"; "The proposition 'that Christ is God' proved to be false from the Jewish and the Christian Scriptures"; "The Scheme of Vicarious Redemption inconsistent with itself, and with the Christian idea of Salvation"; "Christianity without Priest and without Ritual"; "The Christian View of Moral Evil." The element of "protest" suggested by these titles, is by no means wanting in the lectures themselves. The task was, probably, far from congenial, but this only makes more significant the fact that, whether one likes it or not, protest has its place and use. It is difficult to imagine an advocate of Free Trade keeping silence about the evils of Protection, or a Temperance lecturer saying nothing about drunkenness, or a Peace missionary passing by the horrors of war, or an expounder of Immanence forgetting all about the rival doctrine. I do not know what may be the order of things when the Idealists' "Higher Unity" is realised, and what Carlyle called "The Heaven and Hell perpetual Amalgamation Society" is established. But in our present world of relativity, of mingled good and ill, true and false, protest must remain something else than "a poisonous delusion," though, of course, it is always of far less importance (and here I am glad to agree with Mr. Vaughan) than constructive, positive teaching. The question is chiefly one of proportion and emphasis, of tone and temper.

JAMES HARWOOD.

December 3, 1907.

SIR,—Mr. Vaughan's vigorous address at Northampton and his recent letter in THE INQUIRER must have impressed all your readers with a sense of enthusiasm and sincerity. The criticisms of an idealist are always useful, but they are almost always a little unfair to those who are working quietly along old established lines.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association does not exist merely to protest against theological errors. It exists to promote certain definite theological affirmations. Anyone who knows something of the work done by its committee and secretary must be impressed by the energy and ability with which that work is done. Whatever our views as to the name Unitarian or the danger of a society of private subscribers supporting our weaker churches, we gain nothing by ignoring the value and character of its work. Further, I cannot agree that mere protest "is a poisonous delusion which blights all our missionary efforts."

Protest against immorality is often necessary, and right as a first step. We have to protest, e.g., against iniquities on the Congo, against extravagant expenditure on armaments, or against any extension of the powers of vivisection. If protest has its place in moral affairs, it cannot be ruled out as poisonous in theological matters. When a speaker in the Van Mission meets with men who believe in eternal punishment or in a gross form of the Atonement, he is quite justified in protesting strongly against it, uniting with the protest his own positive faith in God and his own thought of Christ. The word Protestant stands for a great moral movement in history, and we are not making for righteousness or clearness of thought, if we try to bring it into derision.

As for the Conference ideal of a union of churches based on freedom, there is nothing in the least inconsistent in it with Mr. Vaughan's desire "to concentrate on the world and its pathetic tragic indifferences." There are some men among us better fitted for appealing to the multitudes outside the churches, there are others who are better fitted for ministering to the needs of an established congregation. There is room for both in the Conference. By all means let some of our ministers go out to those who have given up the habit of public worship, preach the Gospel to them in public halls and on village greens, but this need not involve any belittling of the importance of ordinary congregational work and worship. It is a great mistake to despise our church worship with its simple pieties and quiet ways and small congregations.

I may misunderstand Mr. Vaughan, in thinking that he makes light of the present work and opportunities of our free churches. But there seems to me a real danger in such discontent as he expresses that in striving for something more we may be blind to what we have. I do not believe that, even in our present too unorganised condition, we are threatened with annihilation. Whatever weaknesses we have are due much more to ourselves and our congregations than to want of organisation. The Congregationalists are not much more organised than ourselves, and they certainly show no want of life and power. We need more fellowship, but it must be a fellowship of free ministers and free congregations. It is because I think the Conference is working for a closer fellowship based upon freedom that I desire to support it in its efforts.

H. GOW.

[We must afford Mr. Vaughan space for some further reply in this correspondence, should he desire it, next week, but it will be well to postpone any further expressions of opinion until after Christmas, when we propose to arrange for a full discussion of the position and aims of our churches.—ED. INQ.]

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEALS.

London Domestic Mission: Bell-street, Edgware-road.—The Rev. R. P. Farley, the recently appointed missionary at Bell-street, writes:—"May I, through your columns, make the usual public appeal on behalf of Bell-street Mission for support to the Poor's Purse and Christmas funds? We appear to be threatened with a winter of exceptional distress, and even now unemployment is painfully rife in this district, so that there has been, and will be, a heavy drain on the Poor's Purse. We should also be glad of gifts of clothing, and of dispensary, surgical aid, and hospital notes. This year we are starting a food cupboard (similar to that already existing at Mansford-street), and should be pleased to receive contributions of groceries, &c., and of articles of food which will keep. We should be very grateful if all who have so generously helped us on former occasions would repeat their donations; and if others who have not yet done so could see their way to assist the deserving objects for which I plead. All contributions, whether in money or otherwise, should be forwarded to the Rev. R. P. Farley, Domestic Mission, Bell-street, Edgware-road, by whom they will be thankfully acknowledged."

London Domestic Mission: George's-row.—The Rev. F. Summers writes:—"Would you allow me to appeal to kind friends for special assistance at this period of the year? In a very poor and over-crowded neighbourhood, I am anxious to render what help I can. Not only those out of work, but the aged, the sick, and the young need sympathy and cheer. I should be glad, therefore, of gifts for the Poor's Purse, of new or cast-off garments, boots, &c., and of books and toys. In addition to kind friends who have helped me before, will new friends also give me this welcome aid? Letters may be sent to 4, Durlay-road, Stamford-hill, London, N., and parcels, preferably, to the Domestic Mission, George's-row, St. Lukes, E.C."

Manchester Domestic Mission: Willert-street, Collyhurst.—The Rev. J. W. Bishop writes:—"Friends have for many years helped to make Christmastide brighter for the children and poor folk of this district. May I ask through your valuable paper for a continuance of this assistance? It has been our custom to gather our 500 scholars and give them tea on Christmas Day, to provide an entertainment, and distribute warm garments, books, and toys; also to provide more than 100 very poor people with a Christmas dinner in their own homes. This year we are hoping for sufficient help to enlarge the dinner list, as our larger premises have been the means of bringing a greater number claiming our care. I would call the attention of friends to the fact that as a consequence of this larger number our slender Poor's Purse and other resources have been strained to the utmost. Money, clothing, books, and toys will be gladly received by J. W. Bishop. Please address parcels to the Mission House, Willert-street, and letters to 156, Smedley-road, Cheetham, Manchester."

Bury.—The Bank-street Calendar for December records a dedication and reception service held in the chapel on Sunday evening, November 10, when twenty-seven young people were welcomed by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans into the membership of the church. The form of service for such an occasion, compiled by Mr. Evans two years ago for the welcome service held in connection with the Sunday-school Centenary Celebrations, was used. He conducted the service throughout, and gave an address on "Life more Abundant." To each he gave the right hand of fellowship, the whole congregation standing meanwhile as a sign of their sympathy. Each new member received a printed card commemorating the event before returning to their seats. At the close of the dedication service a communion service was held, when about sixty members and friends remained to join the newly received members.

Chesterfield.—The Elder-yard congregation have recently painted and redecorated their chapel and school buildings, and have also erected a new vestry for the choir at a total expense of £160. On Nov. 17 the Rev. Ambrose Bennett preached the annual Sunday-school sermons, and on the following Monday evening the ladies of the congregation gave their annual tea and entertainment on behalf of the school funds. The small sale of work held last month realised £26 16s. 6d.

Evesham.—The second of a special series of monthly services, such as were held with so much success last winter, was held on Sunday, when the Rev. G. L. Phelps gave the first of four addresses on "Our Faith," the subject being "The Fatherhood of God." Special music is a welcome feature of these services.

Leeds: Hunslet.—The congregation held their triennial bazaar on Nov. 27, 28, and 30. Sir John Ward opened the proceedings on the first day. The Rev. Chas. Hargrove presided, and prayer was offered by the Rev. Francis Wrigley, of Salem Congregational Church. On the second day Miss Kitson, of Burley Hill, performed the opening ceremony, the Rev. H. McLachlan, minister of the church, being in the chair, and the Rev. F. P. Argall (United Methodists) conducting the devotions. On the third day Master Geoffrey Dufton was the opener, and Mr. John Thornton was chairman. The Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Holbeck, offered prayer, and the members of the Junior Singing Class sang suitable selections. The attendances were very good throughout. The total receipts were £220, a sum far exceeding the amount raised on previous occasions. Since the settlement of Mr. McLachlan at Hunslet, more than a year ago, there have been many encouraging signs of prosperity there.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—By the invitation of the Ullet-road Sunday-school teachers, over 100 members and friends met in the Church Hall on Thursday evening, November 28, and were most hospitably entertained. The president (the Rev. J. Morley Mills), in his opening remarks, welcomed the Revs. M. R. Scott (Southport) and Bellamy Higham (St. Helen's) as new members of the Society, and announced that the jubilee of the Society was to be celebrated in January next. Then followed short addresses by the Revs. J. Crowther Hirst, H. D. Roberts, and M. R. Scott, and Mrs. Haigh, all of whom gave most interesting accounts of their visits to American schools at the time of the Boston Conference.

London: Euston Theatre Services.—A feature of last Sunday evening's service was an admirably rendered quartette, "God is a Spirit." It served as an beautiful prelude to the address delivered by the Rev. J. Page Hopps on "The Battle of Life, and How to Win it." Mr. Hopps said that although life was such a struggle for all, it was best that it should be a battle. It was only in the struggle that real men and women were made. To win the battle of life was to win a noble personality. The man who had to toil hard day by day in order to keep a roof above his head, and who did so bravely and honourably, was fighting the battle of life as divinely as anyone.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., is to enter on his ministry at the Church of the Divine Unity on the first Sunday in February.

Trowbridge.—A special baptismal service was held at Conigre Chapel on Thursday evening, November 28, when eighteen adult members were baptized by the Rev. J. Wain by immersion. A preparation class had preceded this reception into the fellowship of the church by baptism, and on the following Sunday the new members were received by their elder brethren at the communion service, when Mr. Wain, on behalf of the church, gave them the right hand of fellowship and presented to each a copy of the rules and order of the church, on which was written a helpful passage of scripture.

West Bromwich.—The old Congregational Society, with some modifications, has been revived, and an interesting programme has been drawn up for the winter session. Miss Helen Caddick is to give a lecture to the members on December 9, on "The Ruined Cities of Peru." On December 8 special sermons will be preached on the work of the B. & F.U.A., and collections are once again to be made on behalf of the funds of the Association. The Rev. F. A. Homer has been re-elected a member of the Free Library Committee. He is shortly to read a paper before the Mutual Improvement Society, connected with the local Baptist Church, on "The Life and Writings of Oliver Wendell Holmes."

WHAT MEN ARE SAYING.

WHAT MEN ARE DOING.

WHAT MEN ARE THINKING.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political, and social progress.

What Mr. R. B. Haldane says of "Public Opinion":—

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion," under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed of men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists, the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.—Yours faithfully,

Percy L. Parker, Esq., Office of "Public Opinion," Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

What Sir Gilbert Parker, M.P., says of "Public Opinion":—

Dear Mr. Parker,—I cannot but congratulate you on that excellent paper, "Public Opinion," which I read regularly. You have a journal of great influence and usefulness.—Yours truly,

GILBERT PARKER.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 30 and 31, Temple House, Tallis-street, London, E.C. Specimens free on application.

ADVERTISEMENTS	798

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Next week's INQUIRER, December 21, will be our Christmas Number. Notices of Christmas Day services for the Calendar must reach the office by Thursday morning, the 19th. As Christmas Day falls on a Wednesday, it will be necessary to print THE INQUIRER of December 28 on the Tuesday of that week, and all advertisements and editorial matter must reach the office by Monday, the 23rd.

SUNDAY week, December 22, immediately preceding Christmas Day, is to be observed as usual as Peace Sunday, and an appeal has been issued to ministers of religion, by the Peace Society, urging that the occasion should be used to bring into prominence the subject of International and Universal Peace. The circular making this appeal notes the good omens of the year in the second Hague Conference, and frequent expressions of international sympathy through the mutual visits of reigning sovereigns and others. The appeal is signed by eighteen Bishops, the Deans of Durham and Ripon, Canon Barnett and Canon Benham, and twenty-one prominent Nonconformists, including Dr. Clifford, Dr. Rendel Harris, Dr. Horton, Mr. Copeland Bowie, Mr. Sylvester Horne, and Mr. Scott Lidgett.

WE have much pleasure in announcing that Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke, the treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, has now received promised subscriptions for the current year sufficient to secure the payment of the £1,000 from the anonymous subscriber. This will prove a great relief to the Committee, as they had entered into engagements which required the larger income. The treasurer is very grateful to those who have so generously come forward on this occasion.

THE Rev. Wilfred Harris, M.A., is to sail for Adelaide with his family on Thursday, February 13, by the White Star s.s. Persic, from Liverpool. The committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will give a farewell reception to Mr. and Mrs. Harris at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, February 11. Mr. Harris, as our readers are aware, is going out to South Australia as minister of the Adelaide Unitarian Church. It is pleasant to read the terms of the resolution of his Bolton congregation on receiving his resignation. "By means of rare tact," the resolution says of Mr. Harris, "by wise counsel, and by personal self-sacrifice, he has fostered and strengthened the bonds of comradeship amongst the members, and infused into the lives of both scholars and congregation so many of his own qualities that the thought of parting is a painful one to us. In his successful ministry we are conscious how ably he has been assisted by Mrs. Harris, whose personality and labours amongst us will remain a pleasant memory, particularly to the younger members. While keenly feeling the severance, we recognise the greater opportunities of service to which he has been called, and in some measure share with him the honour of having been nominated for the appointment by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. We wish him God-speed in his new sphere of usefulness."

THE venerable King of Sweden, Oscar II., who passed away last Sunday morning, in his seventy-eighth year, though a descendant of one of Napoleon's generals, was a man of peace. He was a poet and a serious student, and greatly beloved of his people. He felt very keenly the separation of Norway, but it was his personal influence, above all, which prevented war that might so easily have ensued on the separation of the two nations. It is understood that he was prepared to abandon the throne of Sweden also rather than tolerate the taking of the sword to enforce an unwilling union.

DR. HUNTER recently preached at the parish church of Methlick, N.B., a sermon on "The Day's Work." He dealt with man's purpose in the world, man's creative power, man's share in making himself, and man's share in Christ's work. Of many forceful passages this was particularly notable:—"Worse than the most hopeless pessimism is the shallow optimism of those who are content to repeat as their creed, 'Truth and right are mighty, and must prevail.' But truth and right have never yet prevailed in this world without the help of true and righteous men. Let men seek to escape from personal responsibilities and relax their energies, and lo! the faith and freedom won by martyrs and patriots will soon fall confounded, fanaticism will soon displace a reasonable and spiritual Christianity, superstition will soon re-assert its sway, and passion leap forth again which will throw civilisation back into barbarism and chaos."

THE Rev. W. Garrett Horder, whose well-known hymn-book, "Worship Song," is used both here and in America, has an article in The British Congregationalist on "Worship and its Environment." He attributes the loss from the churches of some of the better-class young people to a lack of taste and appropriateness in church buildings and modes of worship. He asks for an abandonment of the showy hymn and the showy tune. Singing should not be loud, but melodious, and the hymns should be lyrical. The choir should be placed in a position consonant with modesty, not thrust too boldly in the face of the congregation. Decorations should be the least possibly obtrusive. Mr. Horder concludes: "Certainly, if we are to retain our young people of thoughtful minds and educated tastes, we must so arrange our church buildings that, however simple they may be, they will not offend their tastes, and we must so arrange our worship that in its simplicity it may be worthy to stand beside the more ornate worship of the Episcopal Church, and that it may lead the worshipper to feel, 'Surely the Lord is in this place!'"

A most suggestive expression is that used by Colonel Wentworth Higginson in reference to the late Moncure D. Conway. Colonel Higginson describes him as "disarming the learned through his perpetual desire to learn." If the saying is correct, we may unhesitatingly say that Conway knew the way of salvation. It is thus that the terrors of the great and the good are disarmed. The most appalling verse in the Te Deum is the one which confesses "We believe that thou shalt come, to be our judge." The men who can smile serenely at the impudent threats of the so-called Athanasian creed may well enough be disconcerted at the thought of the judgment of Christ, and "the wrath of the Lamb." But the "perpetual desire" to be Christlike will assuredly ward off moral condemnation, as an evident and instant desire to learn renders anger at mistake impossible. The example is worthy, and the expression that describes it deserves to be remembered.

The United Methodist newspaper has now become the official organ of the United Methodist Church. The first number of the new series seems to give promise of a bright readable paper. A brief business-like letter from a missionary in China, the Rev. S. Pollard, exhibits in its curt brevity the true spirit of the active missionary. "The Spirit of God is evidently at work once more, and there is another big thing on hand. Please don't be frightened at the prospect of another great work. Welcome it, rejoice in it, and trust God to find means to cope with it. . . . I have just finished the revision of John's Gospel (in the language of the Miao), and hope to leave it with the printer before I start for England, if ever I do. I detest the very idea of leaving my work."

Two years have brought great changes in the religious life of the little community at Letchworth, which has in that time increased threefold and now numbers nearly 6,000. The first organisation among the new residents was that of the United Sunday Evening Meeting, providing an open platform, and assembling once a month in a private house—now, every week in the Howard Hall. Then the presence of "the unemployed" resulted in services being held during the winters in their "sheds." A Free Church Hall was presently built, and a joint Free Church congregation became settled there, which has recently chosen the Rev. R. W. Jackson, formerly of Guilden Morden, as its pastor. In the meantime other organisations grew up. The adult school became established as a Sunday morning conference, first for men only, but later for men and women; during the summer time Rev. J. Bruce Wallace held Sunday afternoon conferences, now about to be re-opened at the Cloisters; an ethical society and a P.S.A. held a certain number of meetings; a Catholic Mission was opened, and a Friends' Meeting was commenced in the Howard Hall. This will shortly remove to the beautiful oak-panelled hall of a private house, specially designed for its accommodation. Such are a few of the religious organisations which the growth of the place has called into being. The Church of England was, of course, already established in the three parishes of the estate, and especially under the new Rector of Letchworth, the Rev. F. N. Heazell, it has been steadily widening its field of activity, while a new church of St. Michael and the Angels is approaching completion near the centre of the estate.

THERE can be no revelation to stones and trees and stars, nor of the spiritual to the physical. God is a person, and the revelation of God is of a person to and with a person. It thus presumes a ground of communion. —Elisha Mulford.

CORRESPONDENCE.

OUR CHURCHES AND THEIR WORK.

SIR,—In spite of all that Mr. Harwood and Mr. Gow say, I must refuse to reduce the vital discussion of our opportunity to the minor question as to whether our two leading organisations are doing good work "along old-established lines." I gladly admit they are, and gratefully acknowledge their help.

Mine was a much more fundamental question: how are we meeting the moral needs of our times? and to this I get no answer. I gave mine. It was a painful one to make, and every word was dragged out of me, but I feel it was just and true.

If my critics would only face the issue I raised they will find, I think, in my paper and letter, something more serious than "enthusiasm and sincerity." I cannot share the contented tone of their letters. I do not despise our church worship, but I do deplore the numerical weakness of congregations that were once larger and more potent in our civic life. I lament their withered condition as I bemoan the wasted form of a consumptive. Wherever I preach I hear the same story of dwindling congregations and former glories. Once we were healthy, now we are weak. I appeal from official assurance to the laity, and ask if anyone is satisfied with our condition. Other churches have suffered, but their inability might have been our opportunity if we had only raised a standard for the people. Instead of being positive and constructive, we have been prevailingly anti-orthodox and inconsistent to the extent of asserting that character is before creed, and yet spending our energies in combating creeds. I feel that our disaster and disease is due to spiritual pride, the attitude of the superior person talking down to people for their good. Hence my objection to the policy of theological protest. Mr. Harwood and Mr. Gow's defence of this policy does not convince me. There is no real parallel between Unitarian protests against orthodoxy and the attack of Jesus on the Pharisees or of Paul on Judaism. Our Master and his chief apostle had a new and powerful religious impulse to offer, which was to be seen in their lives; whereas our offer has been intellectual criticism of beliefs—beliefs that have been held by saints and martyrs who command our reverence and love, as Martineau declared. In such protests we stand to lose the very spirit of Christianity. We make controversialists rather than Christians.

To compare Unitarian protests to denunciations of immorality on the Congo atrocities (why must Christians go so far afield when they denounce industrial iniquities? There are graver ones near our doors) as Mr. Gow apparently does, is beside the mark. We all admit that sensuality is sin, but intellectual error we have always maintained does not involve the judgment.

And this brings me to my main objection to the Conference. In its vain endeavour to be undogmatic it stands only for the most abstract Theism. Mr. Harwood rejects my description, but he does not tell us what religion the Conference serves.

It claims to represent our group of churches, and they grew up inside the Christian religion; in their worship the Christian scriptures are read, hymns are sung filled with the Christian spirit, and when our ministers have been excluded from Christian organisations of Free Churchmen much indignation has been expressed. Why, then, cannot the Conference state its adherence to the Christian religion?

This is not a question of mere names, but a vital point. Our whole future is bound up in the issue whether we will recognise that our inheritance is Christian, and that our sole justification for existing as a separate body is whether we can develop the old Christianity in a better way. The essence of the Christian religion is a "tissue of personal affections" for the founder. We separated from the other churches, not because we rejected Christ, as ignorant critics are always asserting, but because certain doctrines stood in the way of our discipleship. They help others, they hinder us. I plead for charity and humility. Let us prove the power of our fellowship with Jesus in the common warfare with the world and its corrupting influences. Does it help us to lead better lives and be swift on errands of mercy and redeeming love? Are our churches centres of missionary efforts against the ignorance, vice and injustice around us to-day in England? We have organised to promote theological affirmations. Have we faith to organise for the promotion of the Christian life? Dare we give corporate expression to the essential implications of Divine Fatherhood and human Brotherhood as they were revealed in Jesus? Professor Seth (Hibbert, October, 1907), states the real significance of Christian morality to-day. It is to be found "in the new democratic feeling for the masses of mankind. . . . the Greek state was essentially aristocratic, the many existed—lived and toiled and died—for the few, the ungifted many for the gifted few. But Christ says that the highest must serve the lowest." Here is something more vital than theological error. How do our congregations stand the test? Are they Christian or Greek? Does our cry "Back to Jesus" lead us to reveal the Christ spirit in our lives, and find our opportunity in the opportunity of brotherly love and self-forgetting service?

It is for this ideal of Christian service I plead. I want our congregations to become live Christian churches in this sense. Here is the great need of the age—not freedom, but moral power. You, sir, in a recent leader, showed that freedom is not the dynamic of progress. That dynamic, I believe, is to be found in fellowship with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ. Let us show this power in our altered lives and vigorous churches, we shall have no need to claim the Christian name. It will be given to us.

Mr. Gow misunderstands my missionary plea. I don't believe much in the popular appeals to the multitude. I want to work through the congregation. Hence my plea for the Church ideal. My suggestion is sublime in its simplicity. Start with the children who do come to us through the open door of our Sunday schools. Let us, in Christ's name, take their presence seriously and bend all our energies to educating them in the Christian ideal. Instead of attacking grown-up "superstitions" or spending our time in constructing a church that will include all and satisfy none, let us set to work to put our own house in order, and do so as every wise man should, start with the children, and minister to our young people. Then, instead of having to advertise for hearers, we should find eager listeners in our churches, willing to be further educated and not simply pleased.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

INVALID CHILDREN'S CONVALESCENT HOSPITAL HOME.

SIR,—May I be allowed a little space in your columns to bring the present needs of Winifred House before your readers, to most of whom its name and its work are already quite familiar.

For the last year or two, no special appeal for funds has been made, because the subscription list had been so well supplemented by generous donations as to render that unnecessary. But this year—since May 1, when our 17th year began—only £15 7s. has been received in donations, so that our income, thus far, has been a good deal less than usual; while, on the other hand, our expenses have been greater. This has been due mainly to the illness of our excellent Lady Superintendent, who, after the strain of nine years' strenuous work in the service of the Home, had so run down in health that she was ordered by the doctor to take a prolonged rest; and this meant the appointment of a second Lady Superintendent for six months. We rejoice, however, to have found that the doctor's advice has been abundantly justified, for Miss Hope returned to her work in September, greatly refreshed and invigorated; and since then has been able to carry out her duties most efficiently, and, indeed, to revel in "the joy of service."

Our Home is quite full, with its 18 children. The average number of beds in use this year has been rather larger than usual, thus far; and this fact also accounts for some part of the increased expenditure.

As years go on and we are able to trace the "afterwards" of some few of our cases, we are frequently cheered by hearing how children, who came to us with weak and damaged constitutions, and who had left six or twelve months later in good health, have continued to keep well, and are now able to earn their own living. There is not one of whom we have heard who does not remember Winifred House with love and gratitude.

It is also gratifying to know how thoroughly its work is appreciated by the societies which co-operate, by introducing little invalids to the Home. As an illustration, I should like to refer to an interesting visit paid by some Dutch ladies last spring. They had come to study our various branches of social service, and called at the Invalid Children Aid Association, where they expressed a desire to go over a good children's convalescent home. They were at once told that they should go to Winifred House, as "that is quite one of our best Homes." These ladies already had a private letter of introduction to me, and this made the independent testimony of the secretary of that Society of especial value. I mention this, because our Home is now in its seventeenth year, and friends have a right to inquire whether it still maintains its ground; whether it is still worthy to be Mrs. Hampson's Memorial Home. And it is because that I believe that those questions may truthfully be answered in the affirmative that I dare to ask for a generous response to this appeal for increased financial assistance at the present time.

In conclusion, may I ask those friends who are kindly intending to send gifts for the Christmas Tree, or for the Christmas festivities generally, to send as early as they conveniently can. It is such a busy time that we cannot leave much to be done at the last minute; and it has happened, in former years, that after extra toys had had to be bought for the tree, a splendid parcel arrived, which would have enabled all the gaps to have been filled without any such expenditure of time and money, both of which are such precious commodities at this season.

I shall be very pleased to send a copy of our last report to anyone who desires to know more of our work. Please address me at my private address, 11, Highbury-crescent, London, N., where also donations and subscriptions will be gratefully received. Parcels for the Home should be sent direct to Winifred House, Wray-crescent, Tollington Park, London, N., with the name and address of the donor inside.

A DOMESTIC MISSION IN BOMBAY.

SIR,—Will you allow me, through your columns, to make known an effort that is being made to ameliorate the condition of the people belonging to the lower castes of India.

In connection with the Brahma Samaj a mission has been opened in Bombay, the aim of which is to reach the so-called untouchables, who are living in the most abject poverty, misery and ignorance, thousands of whom die of starvation or plague every year.

The object of this mission is to help the people to raise themselves by promoting education and creating opportunities to enable them to obtain a livelihood.

A noteworthy feature of the effort is that the motive of reform is from within; the mission is not an institution inaugurated by people of another country.

The prime mover in the work is Mr. V. R. Shinde, B.A., missionary of the Brahma Samaj (late Indian student of Manchester College, Oxford). As a consequence of coming under the influence of Dr. Carpenter, who is an enthusiast with regard to Domestic Missions, Mr. Shinde took every opportunity to acquaint himself with such work, as it is carried on in England, visiting the missions in London, Liverpool, Birmingham and Manchester.

On his return home to Bombay, Mr. Shinde worked vigorously to get a similar work started, and a night school for adults has been established, a day school for boys and girls, a Sunday-school, sewing classes for women, a bookbinder's shop for boys, and a library and reading room; the work also includes free medical aid, free baths, temperance work, &c.

Mr. Shinde has sent me accounts of the work from time to time, and recently I received a copy of the annual report, which is a most encouraging one, but it speaks of the work being hampered for want of funds. It has occurred to some of us who have been watching the movement, that an endeavour might be made to raise a small sum, say, £68 (1,000 rupees), to send to the mission as a Christmas gift from our congregations and other sympathisers with the work. So far, I have collected a little over £20 in Manchester, and with the help of friends, I am hoping to raise in the Manchester district in all £34 (500 rupees), and if well-wishers from other places will come forward, not only to contribute their mite, but to do a little collecting amongst friends and fellow-members of their churches, the sum desired will be easily obtained.

Donations will be very gratefully received by (Miss) L. BISHOP.

BOSTON CONFERENCE FUND.

SIR,—It may interest your readers to know that this fund realised a total sum of £987 16s. 11d. Eighty-four ministers received invitations from the Committee, of whom forty-nine were able to accept and attend the Congress. A copy of the Committee's report and accounts has been posted to the subscribers this week.

FROM THE CROW'S NEST.

SIR,—I do not myself identify Geneva Gown individually with "the minister of the City Temple," but with the whole class of which he is a prominent type. The full text of my paper might have made this clearer. Still, "There is no better Calvinist than I," and "We do not sign in a literal sense," do represent utterances of Mr. Campbell.

CONVICTIONS FOR THEFT.

SIR,—In reviewing a book by the Rev. A. W. Fox, M.A., "H. S. S." asks:—"When is a poor man severely punished for stealing a turnip to keep him from starvation, and when does a landowner steal acres of common land?"

If you would allow space I could fill several pages of your journal in giving actual instances in answer to this question. If "H. S. S." will refer to pages 505 and 506 in the issue of John Bull, dated November 30, he will find mention of a recent case in which a labourer was sent to prison for 21 days for stealing turnips from a field. The man was out of work, and he and his wife and children were starving. For a crime quite as heinous, viz., stealing two fowls, a man was recently sentenced to five years penal servitude, at the Essex Quarter Sessions. The latter part of the question could be fully answered by the Rev. Haydn Williams.

LITERATURE.

DR. CAIRD'S LAY SERMONS.*

"DURING my tenure of the mastership of Balliol College," says Dr. Caird, "I was in the habit of delivering a lay sermon at the beginning of each academical year, following thus, as far as a layman could, the example of my predecessors. A number of these discourses are preserved, and they are published at the desire of some of those who heard them."

We can hardly give this volume higher praise, or praise which we think Dr. Caird himself would value more, than to say that it ranks in value and interest with the University Sermons of his brother, the late Principal of Glasgow University. The latter were, indeed, addressed to much larger congregations, and are more popular and stirring in their language. The sermons before us, on the other hand, were spoken to students and especially to Balliol men. But in both alike we feel men of large knowledge and deep thought, men who have grappled with the great mysteries of existence, expressing simply and sincerely their convictions and ideals. There is always something especially attractive and helpful in the words of a true philosopher who has been living a hard, strenuous life of abstract thought, when, standing before an audience of young men with all their temptations, their aspirations, and their difficulties, he tries to tell them how they ought to live and what they ought to do. No congregation is more inspiring, no congregation is in greater need of help. A philosopher may well feel that here is the test of his far-reaching thoughts and speculations. Has he, as a result of all his learning and his thought, any simple, forcible moral and religious message to young men? Can he strengthen their moral life? Can he deepen their trust in God?

Dr. Caird's Lay Sermons are a triumphant vindication of the practical power of the true philosopher and of the strength to religion which philosophy may give. They reveal him as a man who believes in God, in freedom, and in immortality. He knows well the confusion and sadness and pain of the world, but he has a firm faith in the goodness of life and a strong confidence in the future both here and in the unseen.

Speaking of the apparent weakening of religious certainty, he says: "What the chilling of man's faith ultimately points to is that the great truths are separating themselves from the little ones, the eternal verities of the divine life in man from the passing phases and adjuncts of human tradition. 'There is always a positive behind every negative cause. It is the greatest of mistakes to confuse the throes of new birth with the agonies of death, and he who looks beneath the surface may see in the agitation and uncertainty of the world, in the doubt and trouble of an intellectual life, the indications of the dawn of a faith in God and man, wider, calmer, freer from illusions, and more comprehensive, though not less keen and earnest in its charity, than has ever been seen in the world before."

That strong, quiet confidence in religion amidst the doubts and negations and criticisms of our time is seen also in his treatment of the social confusions and upheavals amidst which we live. "The enormous demand upon life made by all and for all is one of the most startling facts of our day, and many look upon it with no little alarm, fearing, on the one side, that the desire for pleasure may quench the spirit of love and self-sacrifice, and fearing, on the other side, that the effort of all to participate in the good things of life may lead to some dreadful socialistic overturn in which even the goods now possessed by mankind may be lost. We must recognise the danger, but, nevertheless, we may find in this great demand upon life—and especially in the fact that it is a demand for all, and not for some—a ground of hope that a better day for humanity is dawning—a day in which our morality shall be felt less as a mere restraint and more as an inspiring power, and in which religion shall cease to be to many only a consolation for defeat in this world and become a living faith in the coming of the Kingdom of God on earth."

"Little as we have to boast of in the present state of things," he says elsewhere, "there are more men now who are labouring and hoping for the realisation of the kingdom of heaven upon earth than there were in any previous age of the world."

Dr. Caird describes, in a sermon on "Freedom and Truth," what he means by religion and Christianity. "A man's real religion, whatever his verbal creed, is his attitude of mind and will to that which he thinks highest and most real in life. What we mean by God, as Goethe said, is the best that we know. And Christians are those who believe that this highest and most real good of life has been set before them in the image of Christ."

In a sermon on Immortality, which reminds us continually of Professor Henry Jones' noble Essex Hall Lecture on the same subject, Dr. Caird says: "Direct proof of immortality cannot be had, or not in a conclusive form, but if we believe in God, immortality seems to follow as a natural—perhaps we should say as a necessary—consequence. . . . The outcome of a world which is the realisation of the will of God must be either immortality for beings who are made in his image or something better—and what better can there be that does not involve immortal life?"

Several of the sermons deal with national subjects, one being on the Queen's Jubilee, another on her death, and a third on "The Nation as an Ethical Ideal." They are the sermons of a true liberal possessed by a deep sense of national responsibility and with a firm conviction that national welfare is rooted in righteousness.

Other sermons deal with such subjects as "The Great Decision," "True Purity," "Courage," "Salvation Here and Hereafter." All of them are characterised by the strength of their moral appeal and of their confidence in good.

"The spirit of the wise and good is a prophetic spirit," says Dr. Caird. These Sermons are full of that prophetic spirit. They speak of nobler life, of deeper unity, of calmer trust, and they bring nearer the time when those things of which they speak shall be realised. H. G.

RELIGION AND ENLIGHTENMENT.*

THE volume in which Mr. Campbell shows us what kind of preaching results from the adoption of the New Theology is an intensely interesting study for all who are concerned with religious expression. We have here the clash of two different men—the advocate of "enlightenment," and the poet-preacher who brings up out of his own soul's depths things over whose surface "enlightenment" can only play with the lightest touch. So distinct are these two men that we can distinguish the sermons according as now one and now the other takes the leading part. Thus, in the first part of the volume we are introduced to the now familiar conceptions of the archetypal Divine Man, and the New Theology teachings about "The Risen Christ," "The Ever Present Christ," "Sin and Salvation," &c. But towards the end of the book the titles are "The Angel of the Soul," "The Valley of Baca," "Sweetening the Waters of Marah," "Believing Prayer," and here we have got quite away from the agile manipulator of doctrinal theses, and we sit at the feet of one who is skilled in feeding the hungry hearts of men. It is the old story. Let a preacher speak out of the fulness of his own experience ("look in thine heart and write"), and we are even willing to take his theology—at any rate, for the moment—at his own valuation. In these latter (properly religious) sermons there is evoked a strong sense of reality. It is a real man speaking to real men; and with this there goes the fascinating spiritual tact which is the greater part of Mr. Campbell's secret, by means of which he wins and holds us when we go to hear him preach. Then, quite in addition to this, but in beautiful natural keeping with it, is the gift of naïve, literary picture-speech. The great snare of extempore speakers, if they are intellectual men, is a sort of abstract, bookish style, which is easily produced by the hour, leading to untold diffuseness and dullness. John Foster long ago commented on the inability of popular preachers to write well. It is Mr. Campbell's rare power to speak quite freely in sentences charming to hear and acceptable to read.

As to the "enlightenment" sermons, as we may call them (those, that is, which try to "explain" the great facts of Christian experience in terms of the New Theology), they suffer from the general defect of all mediating categories which come forward to express an experience in terms of a world which has it not. The attempt which Mr. Campbell makes to "come to terms" with the modern world and its thought proceeds too much on the assumption that the desiderated re-interpretation of Christianity is re-explanation. But "explanation" of spiritual experiences is, palpably, out of the question.

* "Lay Sermons and Addresses." Delivered in the Hall of Balliol College, Oxford. By Edward Caird, LL.D. (Glasgow: J. Maclehose & Sons. 6s. net.)

* "New Theology Sermons." By Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A. (Williams & Norgate, 1907. 6s.)

The aim of religion can never be analogous to that of science. The procedure of science is to explain the unknown by the known. The procedure of religion is to illuminate the seen by the unseen. Science means limiting our ignorance and our presumptions as to what is possible. Religion means widening these assumptions and emphasising our ignorance of limitations. Not "enlightenment" is the keynote of religious interpretation, but vision, penetration, awakening. The real interpretation that we need is, not a new manipulation of old religious ideas, but a deeper religion. No great religion has ever distinguished between itself and its interpretation. But the New Theology bears the consciousness of this distinction written in its every feature. For example, it takes the all-engrossing fact (to the Christian soul) of Redemption, and "explains" it as a phenomenon of social relationships. It is explanation of the greater by the less—a method that will not work in religion. Mr. Campbell thinks highly of Mr. Bernard Shaw, and it would be well if he would, in this matter, take a leaf out of his book. Mr. Shaw has a vivid appreciation of the distinctly religious consciousness (see his preface to the play "Major Barbara"). But he never makes the mistake of identifying this with social impulses which, however valuable in their own sphere, have significance only in that sphere. Mr. Shaw is, indeed, an unsatisfactory exponent of the religious consciousness, but at least he has a keen eye for realities. And this is what we need in our reconstructed faith. We are grateful to Mr. Campbell for the good things he brings out of the treasury. But there is yet a deeper depth.

W. WHITAKER.

ONE WITH THE ETERNAL.*

HERE is a beautiful gift, which we should like to think will be passed from hand to hand by many friends this Christmas time. A plain little book, in a quiet cloth cover, but it is at the heart of all that is most worth having in life. Six chapters of what were probably first of all Sunday morning expositions of 1 Cor. xiii., and as prelude, the chapter itself, concluding "the greatest of these is love"—that is, the whole contents of the book.

It is an exposition in touch with the real things of life that Mr. Daplyn gives us here. With true discernment and practical good sense he touches on many aspects of everyday experience, and yet throughout makes us aware of the unseen things, which are eternal, the greatest of which is love. Let us give one instance from the chapter on "Love's Humility." He is speaking of what alone can perfect the gifts of charity:—

"We look upon the charitable gifts of man, and see but the giving. Most of us are satisfied with that. Our wants are so many, and cry with so insistent a voice that they force us to hold out the hand. The custom begets callousness. But there are always those whose faces are tinged with shame in the presence of such doings, whose sense of the great brotherhood is deeply pained. They see a donor apart from his gift; they read the pride of a conscious almsdeed, the condescension that stamps the absence of brotherly love. The giver is but a haughty agent bending towards poverty with uncomprehending smile. Is it any wonder that the self-respecting stand aloof from such gifts, that their leaders are stung into rebellion, and that few words have a deeper bitterness for honest and honourable poverty than that word 'charity'? Can they care for it when it represents but a fraction of that which is man's due? Can they value the endowment of a college, or a university, or a church, which is but a calculated set-off to a ruinous trust in steel or oil? Shall they feel real gratitude when the savings of a gambler, whether on turf or on 'Change, are given to hospitals? What shall the poor man think when meat is given him from the rich man's table, if all the while he knows that the rich man would not touch him with the tips of his fingers. Ah, charity is not so cheap and simple as it looks. It is the costliest luxury in life. It demands so much more than the gift. A patient understanding of another's life, an entry by the door of sympathy, a burning of the walls that sunder, a brother's thoughtfulness and outlook. We cannot stand upon a height for this. We must come down into the common plain, be one with those we help, find our hearts beat with theirs, share all their fears and hopes, and help them in the bearing of their cross. Will anything but love's humility teach us this?"

Note also in this chapter the passage towards the end on "love envieth not," and in the next chapter on "Love's Power," the passage beginning at the bottom of p. 32: "There are critical moments in every life when we attempt to blend love with unrighteousness."

One point we note for question in the chapter, "Why love never fails." Speaking of the way in which love finds itself in English poetry, Mr. Daplyn says that "in the Elizabethans love is earthly, sensual, a thing of decay. It is absolutely pagan." And in this judgment Shakespeare is included: "Romeo and Juliet, or Hamlet and Ophelia, are pre-Christian." But if Tennyson's love for Arthur Hallam is cited as one of the modern instances of a more spiritual interpretation of love, ought we not to remember also the love of Cordelia for her father, and the master spirit of the "Tempest"? And surely it was not an altogether "pagan" love which possessed Lorenzo in that lovely moonlight scene in the "Merchant of Venice," when he could say to Jessica:—

"Look, how the floor of heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold:
There's not the smallest orb which thou beholdest,

But in his motion like an angel sings."

There are other passages in Mr. Daplyn's little book that we should have liked to cite. The chapter on "The True Nature of Knowledge" is full of helpful suggestion; but so in fact is the whole exposition, and we are not surprised, but very glad to hear, that of the American issue a second edition has already been called for. Here also we are confident that this book will find a growing circle of friends.

STOPFORD BROOKE'S NEW BOOK.*

WE are not surprised that Mr. Stopford Brooke's new volume of literary studies, published this autumn, is already in a second edition. Every such volume from his pen is sure of a very hearty welcome, and there are others that we are waiting for—some more Shakespeare lectures among them.

The present volume has for frontispiece one of the best portraits of the author that we have seen—a beautiful print from an Ambleside photograph, in holiday garb. Half the volume is Shelley, and the rest Blake, Scott, and Keats.

Blake holds the first place, as by right, from his historical position, a forerunner of the Revolution, mystic, artist, and prophet, the passionate poet of freedom, before the greater poets came; the poet also of a divine childhood and the love of God. Of the "Songs of Innocence" Mr. Brooke says: "As to the songs themselves, they are as gay, as sweet, as musical, and as tender as the song of a mother-bird over her nestlings when the sunny wind is playing in the tree; such songs as a child who had the wisdom of an angel might sing as it wandered in the flowery glades of Eden."

Thus Blake sang to the babe new-born:—

"Pretty joy!

Sweet joy but two days old.

Sweet joy I call thee.

Thou dost smile,

I sing the while;

Sweet joy befall thee!

"I have no name—

I am but two days old."

What shall I call thee?

"I happy am,

Joy is my name."

Sweet joy befall thee!"

William Blake was born in 1757, Walter Scott in 1771, and it is of his poetry that Mr. Brooke speaks in the second essay. Incidentally, we come upon this pleasant little bit of autobiography:—

"I am sorry," says Mr. Brooke, "for the children who are not brought up on the poetry of Scott. It is an excellent foundation for the appreciation and love of all other poetry; it lays up in the minds of those who care for it elements of enchanting pleasure in after-life. My father waked us every morning with snatches from the "Lay," from "Marmion," and the "Lady of the Lake," and the day was haunted with their charm. We learnt for ourselves more than half of the poems. Wherever we played, or walked on the hills or by the sea, Scott taught us to build up tales of war and love around the names and scenery of the places, and to fill them with romantic adventures. The first expedition I made after I was twenty-one was made with my brother to Loch Katrine and the Trosachs, to Glenfinlas and Stirling, and it was one long ravishment; nor did I enjoy Wordsworth, who was then my companion, the less, but the more, because I was living every step of the way with Scott. Many years afterwards, when years of London life had, as I thought, lessened the romantic wonder, I went North, and found myself in the early morning looking from a height over a castle famed in Border minstrelsy, and beyond it lay the Solway and its hills—Lavercoast, Askerten, Bewcastle, Liddesdale, Teviot, and Eskdale—and on the right the ridges of the Roman Wall, the valleys, the rolling rig and flow of the Border mosses and the Border hills. There was scarcely a single name of river, mountain, or sea-estuary, castle or farmhouse, which was not known to me from the poetry of Scott. I leaned over the gate and looked long upon the poetic land, and it seemed as if all the dew of youth fell upon me again, as if I were again in the ancient world of adventure, romance, love, and war, which we have replaced by science and philosophy, trade and misery, luxury and poverty. But it was to Scott I owed the pre-eminent pleasure of that hour, an hour the impression of which I kept like a precious jewel, and which I have never lost."

The Shelley half of the book consists of three essays or addresses. First, the Inaugural address to the Shelley Society, at University College, March 10, 1886, with a vigorous defence of the poet's poet against Matthew Arnold's criticism and depreciation of Shelley as compared with Byron. This is followed by an essay on the Lyrics of Shelley, and a later Shelley Society address on "Epipsychidion." To an analysis of that glorious lyric, the "Ode to the West Wind," Mr. Brooke devotes seven pages. "I do not like analysing a poem," he says, "any more than I care to dissect a flower," and yet, for once, to show its marvellous vitality and the order of its beauty, he undertakes the task, leading up to the final cry of unextinguishable hope:

"O Wind,

If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?"

On which the poet-critic exclaims: "This is the lyric of lyrics. It is the hymn of our own world. It ought to be set to music by a great musician, but he should have the genius of Beethoven. 'Infectual Angel!' indeed; nay, rather impassionating Angel!"

The essay on Keats concludes the volume, and it is a very fitting conclusion, showing us what we have in this poet of "the sorrowless land of beauty," with its blessed healing and refreshing. Keats himself came to see that something more was needed, and hoped that he might have sung some greater song of human destiny, but death cut off that hope.

"Nor need we mourn too much," says Mr. Brooke in conclusion. "He is at home with the King in his beauty, in that land which is not so very far off as the prophet thought it then. On his grave the words he chose himself are carved: 'Here lies one whose name was writ in water.' The water flows in all our hearts, and in the meadows within, where we walk when we are alone, there are a thousand flowers, born and nourished by his sweet and songful streams."

The second volume of Karl Marx's Capital: A Critique of Political Economy deals with the Process of Circulation of Capital. It is translated from the second German edition by Ernest Untermann. (Chicago: C. H. Kerr & Co. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 10s. 6d.)

MR. BINNS'S "BOTTICELLI."*

THE new art series of "Masterpieces in Colour" issued by Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack succeeds admirably in its purpose of bringing the great artists, with glimpses of their chief pictures, printed in colour, within easy reach of the people. We have turned with special interest to the volume on "Botticelli," by Henry Bryan Binns, and find that we know more and care more for the great artist after reading it. The printing of the eight pictures does not seem to us so successful as in the "Turner" volume of this series; but that is doubtless due to the character of the pictures themselves, and we ought to be more than satisfied to have so much for eighteenpence. At the same time, we must confess that we are not greatly moved by the coloured print of "The Birth of Venus," the picture "generally regarded as the supreme achievement of Botticelli's genius," and we prefer to dwell upon the interpretation which Mr. Binns gives of the picture, without looking too much at the print, and wishing ourselves back at Florence, to study the picture itself in the Uffizi. "Her figure," Mr. Binns says of the Venus, "tall, slender, and quite central in the picture, feels the wind and light about it, but not shrinkingly. It floats and moves, yet without consciousness of movement, as it were a somnambulist moving across the sea, the pearly luminous quality of this living ethereal body, the heavy golden tresses of the long hair that hangs heavily against the wind, which with one hand she holds, while she lays the other dreamily on her breast—these are in the most perfect harmony with that flower-like immortal wistfulness which Sandro has put into her face."

Botticelli belongs to the great age of Florence, and Mr. Binns lets us see the progress of his art and its setting in the history of that stirring time. Of his Madonnas, the most famous are here reproduced. The beautiful picture of "The Virgin and Child with St. John and an Angel," from a panel in the National Gallery, is also given, but with a note that this is no longer ascribed to Botticelli.

"Botticelli is at his best," says Mr. Binns, in conclusion, "when he escapes from conventionality of subject, and is able to give wing to a lyrical imagination comparable to that of Shelley. He is one of those who feel the wind of the spirit blowing out toward new worlds. He loved the wind, and all things that the wind caresses, trees, draperies, floating hair, and the naked body. Also he loved the light and hated darkness. He had inspired moments when he beheld that the old order of the mediæval world had passed already away, and the hearts of men were turning to the pure worship of living incarnate loveliness—the mystery of a re-born and immortal pleasure, Venus Anadyomene, beheld with mystic sight. But in that age it was a prophetic vision, and his own eyes failed him. He died in a time of darkness. For four centuries his visions were forgotten, to be beheld again by us with a renewal of the wonder and aspiration, the passionate desire for freedom and for beauty, out of which they came."

OBITUARY.

MR. HERBERT MARSLAND.

THE Stockport congregation has just suffered a great loss in the death of Mr. Herbert Marsland, of Woodbank, on December 4. He was born February 6, 1831, and was therefore in his 77th year. He was the third son of Mr. Henry Marsland, who represented Stockport in Parliament as a Liberal for 12 years, and died in 1864. He was a director of Henry Marsland, Ltd., bleachers, Park Bleach Works, but took no active part in the business. For many years he resided at Brinnington Mount, Stockport, and at Kew, but when Woodbank passed into his possession on the death of his brother, Henry Allatt Marsland, in 1890, he went to reside there. Soon afterwards a great sorrow came upon him in the death of his wife in 1892. Mr. Marsland has left no children, and was the last of his family.

The Woodbank estate is a splendid park, containing 250 acres, and made an ideal place for the garden parties and fêtes which were frequently held there by Mr. Marsland's kind permission, in connection with the Unitarian Church. His ancestors came from the neighbouring parish of Norbury, where they had lived for many generations. In 1783 his great-grandfather, Henry Marsland, one of the pioneers of the cotton trade in Stockport, purchased two old mills in the Park, and converted them into cotton factories, and his grandfather, Peter Marsland, commenced the bleach works in the Park. Peter Marsland purchased the Woodbank estate in 1810, and in 1829 was buried in the private mausoleum which he had erected there. Henry Marsland, son of the preceding, and father of the deceased, married the second daughter of Mr. Henry Hollins, of Pleaseley Vale.

Along with Major Coppock and Mr. Orrell, Henry Marsland was one of the founders of the present Stockport Unitarian Church, took an active part in the town's affairs, and, as already mentioned, became M.P. for Stockport. His wife, the mother of the deceased, was a lady of rare sweetness of disposition and personal charm.

Mr. Herbert Marsland was buried in the Woodbank Mausoleum on Saturday last, when many of the leading inhabitants of the town and representatives of local charitable institutions were present, including Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Hollins and several of their cousins, Mr. Alderman J. G. Johnson and his sons, who have long been connected with the management of the Marsland's Bleach Works, and several representatives of the Stockport Unitarian Church, viz.:—Messrs. Russell Coppock, R. T. Heys, W. Humphreys, E. Horrocks, J. J. Jordan, T. Molyneux, and J. F. Spedding. The service was held in the Woodbank Hall, and was conducted by the Rev. B. C. Constable. A memorial service was held in the Unitarian Church on Sunday morning last, when, in the course of his sermon, Mr. Constable said:—"If there was one characteristic of Mr. Herbert Marsland which stood out more prominently than another it was the largeness of his heart—his kindness of disposition, his wide benevolence, his compassion for all suffering creatures, and his firm belief and practice in doing good. . . For many years he was the picture of health and strength, tall and erect, the very model of a good country squire. But of late his health had given way, and for some months before his death he suffered much. I saw him several times during his illness, and rarely have I seen anyone more resigned to the prospect of death. . . He had always been a member of this church and congregation, and a generous contributor to its funds, and before his health began to break down he was invariably to be seen in his place at the morning service. During the 16 years in which I had the pleasure of knowing him I always found him the same—kind, generous, upright, high-principled, and with a righteous scorn for all dishonourable ways. He was a warm supporter of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, an enthusiastic member of the Anti-Vivisection Society, and the president of the Stockport Branch of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children from its formation 15 years ago. Although he did not take any active part in politics, nor in the public affairs of the town, he was deeply interested in most of its charitable institutions, and it is well known that he regularly relieved a troop of poor pensioners. Mr. Marsland will be sorely missed by many hundreds in this town. Many hearts will be torn with grief, and none will feel it more than those who knew him best. . . Let us thank God for the gift of this good man, let us learn the lesson of his life and death, and let us do our best to be worthy of his love."

MR. J. H. WRAY.

We regret to announce the death of Mr. James Hanley Wray, of Chelmsford, which occurred on November 28, at the advanced age of 80. He was one of the founders of the Unitarian Church in this town, and until physical infirmity prevented was one of its most regular attendants. His religious principles were deep rooted, and all who knew him respected him for his consistency, and the sterling worth of his character. For more than 40 years he represented Springfield on the Chelmsford Board of Guardians. He was a member of the Rural District Council, and also of the old Highway Board, which preceded the council. Throughout his long public service he was the embodiment of courtesy, while his practical business habits helped to make him an extremely useful adviser upon all the varied matters in connection with the administration of the Poor Law, as well as upon the sanitary administration of the district. A very large and representative gathering of townspeople attended the funeral service in the cemetery, which was conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

ENGLISH ARTISTS: V.—LANDSEER.

ALL lovers of animals like Landseer's pictures, and there cannot be many English people who are not acquainted with his beautiful paintings of dogs, horses, and stags. Many of them are in our public galleries, and in these days of reproduction by printing and photography, Landseer's animals find their way into schoolroom and nursery, and children of every class grow up familiar with them.

Amongst those which are widely known, are the "Sleeping Bloodhound," the powerful animal lying stretched on a rug, with his great head resting on his fore leg; "Shoeing the Bay Mare," in which the beautiful creature is standing patiently to have her shoe made secure; "The Cavalier's Pets," two charming little King Charles's Spaniels; and "Dignity and Impudence," a large dog and a little one looking out from the same kennel. These four paintings and three others are in the National Gallery; ten or twelve are in the Tate Gallery, including the great dog, known as "A Distinguished Member of the Humane Society;" and there are a good many less well known pictures in the South Kensington Museum, as well as some drawings which were done by Landseer as a boy.

Besides the pictures of this great artist, we have the famous "Lions" in Trafalgar Square, those four majestic bronze animals which guard Nelson's column.

There are two studies for the lions in the National Gallery, in both of which Landseer has painted the animals standing, but no doubt he made sketches of them in many attitudes before he could satisfy himself as to which would be most suitable for Trafalgar Square.

Landseer had from childhood a genuine love of animals, and it was his sympathy with them that makes so many of his pictures touch some answering chord in our nature.

As a boy he was encouraged by his father to draw from life, and each drawing was carefully looked at and the mistakes shown to the young artist. The father, John Landseer, was an engraver living in London, and of the five children who grew up out of a large family, four were artists. Edwin was born in March, 1802, and at four years of age he began to make little pencil sketches of the various objects that he noticed. From the first his father was a strict master. He liked his little son to draw, but never allowed drawing to degenerate into mere scribbling for amusement. The three little brothers used to go out to sketch in the fields which were then near Marylebone, and when they returned the father examined and praised or criticised their work.

In the South Kensington Museum there is a frame containing nine of Edwin's childish attempts at pictures. A pencil drawing of a dog which he did at the age of five; a somewhat strange looking little calf, with this inscription on the margin of the paper, "drawn by E. L. when he was first breeched;" a donkey's head, drawn at eight years old; a cow's head, marked "drawn from nature by E. L. in 1810, aged 8 years and 2 months," and five other similar efforts.

At seven years old Edwin had learnt to etch, and by the time he was ten he had begun to study anatomy and to paint both in water and in oil colours. At twelve he exhibited a drawing of a "Hunting Horse," and won a silver medal, and the following year two of his pictures were hung at the Royal Academy, "A Mule," and "A Pointer Bitch and Puppy."

Edwin Landseer is described at this time as "a bright, curly headed youngster, honest of face, with eyes that shone with kindness." He was very kindly by nature, and his great characteristic was his love and compassion for animals. He believed that many animals were as full of intelligence as human beings. Dogs he especially loved, and as he grew up he painted pictures of horses, dogs, cattle, and sheep, which were intended to teach a lesson to the world, the lesson of love and trust and sympathy between men and animals.

He began to study in the Royal Academy Schools in 1816, when he was about fourteen, and it was whilst there that Fuseli, then Professor of painting at the schools, called the young artist his "curly headed dog boy." From his earliest youth Landseer began and continued to exhibit his paintings, and the whole of his career as an artist was a successful one. He was one of the most rapid of painters, the great "Sleeping Bloodhound" having been finished in two days, and the "King Charles's Spaniels," were also done in the same incredibly short space of time. Though so rapid, Landseer was never careless in his work, but was most accurate in drawing the forms of dogs and horses, lions and stags.

In the 15th century there lived an artist in Florence, Piero di Cosimo, who was one of the very early painters of animals. In one of his pictures in the National Gallery there is a dog which it is interesting to compare with Landseer's paintings. In the old Italian picture the dog is not wholly unnatural, indeed it has a gentle sorrowful look that is almost human in its sympathy, as it watches the poor wounded girl who is lying on the ground; but turn to look at the great English painter's dogs and see how absolutely like life they are! Notice the little Spaniels with their bright eyes and their silky coats which might almost be stroked, and the great head of the Bloodhound on which you feel you could lay your hand. Two of his best dog pictures are "High Life" and "Low Life," both now in the Tate Gallery.

Charles Dickens and Thackeray were amongst Landseer's friends, besides many other well known men and women of his time; a very sincere friend he had in Queen Victoria, who often invited him to stay at Osborne and at Balmoral during the life of Prince Albert. Both these royal pupils took lessons in the art of etching, in which they were much interested, and the Queen used often to take long walks with Landseer, and sketch under his advice and guidance. As a mark of her regard and friendship she gave him the Order of Knighthood in 1850.

Sir Edwin died in the year 1873. He ranks as one of our first artists, and as the greatest animal painter of England.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

DEC. 17, 1807—SEPT. 7, 1892.

ON Tuesday next, December 17, the WHITTIER centenary will, doubtless, be celebrated with grateful remembrance in the solitary little farm house three miles from Haverhill, in the valley of the Merrimac, where he was born—a house now fittingly maintained as a memorial of the poet—and also at Amesbury, at the quiet house in Friend-street, which was WHITTIER's home for the greater part of his long life.

And while our thoughts gladly travel to that pleasant country on the northern borders of Massachusetts, and to the friends that may be gathered there, rejoicing with them in the possession of such memories, of a life so true and noble in its simplicity, in the quiet heroism of its devotion to a great cause, in the music of the poet voice, used with passionate invective in the fight, and then growing in sweetness of tone, with the clear vision, the gracious light, the deep, calm faith of mature manhood and a beautiful old age—we claim also our own thankful commemoration, in our homes and in our churches, since this poet of the simple things of human life, of duty passionately given for the cause of freedom and humanity, and of the deep things of faith and love, belongs to us also. For more than one generation, WHITTIER has had an assured place in the hearts of English-speaking folk the world over, and as very truly one of the people his voice has been recognised as at home here in the old country almost as much as in New England. He and LONGFELLOW and LOWELL have been the surest witnesses to our close kinship, and have bound fast the cords of true affection and confidence. In their brave words and the music of their song, their faith and earnest purpose and lofty aspiration, speaking that to which the best in our own hearts instinctively responds, and with the readiness and gladness to which we answer in the home circle to a brother's voice, we know we are one people, though the great ocean separate our shores.

WHITTIER we do not acclaim as a great poet, but as one loved and honoured, worth more to us than many poets of far greater genius. "I am not one of the master singers and don't pose as one," he wrote in 1883 to F. H. UNDERWOOD, who was preparing a biography "By the grace of GOD I am only what I am, and don't wish to pass for more," "Do not forget," he said in an earlier letter, "that I have lived a hard life outside of my verse making."

And, while my words are read,

Let this at least be said:

"Whate'er his life's defeatures,

He loved his fellow-creatures.

"Age brought him no despairing

Of the world's future faring;

In human nature still

He found more good than ill.

"To all who dumbly suffered,

His tongue and pen he offered;

His life was not his own,

Nor lived for self alone.

"Hater of din and riot,

He lived in days unquiet;

And, lover of all beauty,

Trod the hard ways of duty.

"He meant no wrong to any

He sought the good of many,

Yet knew both sin and folly—

May God forgive him wholly!"

So WHITTIER wrote in 1882, and again, in the same year, his seventy-fifth, and really ten years before his death, he wrote the lines "At Last":—

When on my day of life the night is falling,

And in the winds from unsunned places blown,

I hear far voices out of darkness calling
My feet to paths unknown,

Thou who hast made my home of life so pleasant,

Leave not its tenant when its walls decay;

O Love Divine, O Helper ever present,
Be thou my strength and stay.

Be near me when all else is from me drifting;

Earth, sky, home's pictures, days of shade and shine,

And kindly faces to my own uplifting
The love which answers mine.

I have but Thee, my Father! let Thy spirit

Be with me then to comfort and uphold;

No gate of pearl, no branch of palm I merit,

Nor street of shining gold.

Suffice it if—my good and ill unreckoned,
And both forgiven through Thy abundant grace—

I find myself by hands familiar beckoned

Unto my fitting place.

Some humble door among Thy many mansions,

Some sheltering shade where sin and striving cease,

And flows for ever through heaven's green expansions

The river of Thy peace:

There, from the music round about me stealing,

I fain would learn the new and holy song,
And find at last, beneath Thy trees of healing,
The life for which I long.

The note is pure and true, and WHITTIER has set to music thoughts and aspirations of the deeper life of the Spirit, of personal religion as it seeks expression in this new generation, for which we cannot be too thankful.

"They fail to read clearly the signs of the times," he wrote in the Friends' Review of March, 1870, "who do not see that the hour is coming when, under the searching eye of philosophy, and the terrible analysis of science, the letter and the outward evidence will not altogether avail us; when the surest dependence must be upon the light of CHRIST within, disclosing the law and the prophets in our own souls, and confirming the truth of outward scripture by inward experience; when smooth stones from the brook of present revelation shall prove mightier than the weapons of Saul; when the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, as proclaimed by GEORGE FOX, and lived by JOHN WOOLMAN, shall be recognised as the only efficient solvent of doubts raised by an age of restless inquiry."

That sure witness of the Spirit he not only steadfastly declared, but became the singer of some of its clearest tones. There are other things for which we honour him, for his own sterling character, for what he did in fearless service of the anti-slavery cause, and for true citizenship, and we rejoice in his pictures of New England life in the happy setting of his poems; but here we remember with a very special thankfulness the hymns he has given us, as we gather them from his religious poems. Some of his hymns, such as those taken from the poems on "The Eternal Goodness" and "Our Master," and those other verses, "Dear Lord and Father of Mankind" and "O sometimes gleams upon our sight," are among those which we most delight to sing in the public worship of our churches.

What we feel concerning WHITTIER could hardly be better expressed than in these lines written at the time of his death by FREDERICK L. HOSMER:—

No thrush at eve had ever sweeter song
Than thine whose voice no more on earth we hear;
Nor winds and flowing streams more please the ear,
Nor to the speech of Nature more belong.
And yet thy heart beat ever with the throng
Of toil; the lowliest life thou did'st revere,
And the wide law of brotherhood hold dear,
Most mindful still of all who suffered wrong.
Best loved of all the choir we loved so well,
'Twas thine again to bring the Master near,

And hymn to men the Goodness without end:

Psalmist we call thee of our Israel,
Child of the Spirit, poet, prophet, seer—
And to us all, of every name, the Friend!

TO WHITTIER.

December 13, 1907.

CITIZEN departed,
Comrade, loyal-hearted,
Lover of the human—
Child, or man, or woman—
Seeing in the lowliest
Image of the holiest,
Free man, peace man, fighter,
Trenchant tyrant-smiter,
Strong, the weak defending,
Friend, thy race befriending,
Wheresoe'er thou farest,
Whatsoe'er thou sharest,
Fearless Knight of Pity
Name me of thy City!

Century bells are ringing
Tribute to thy singing,
Singer for all seasons,
Sense's bard, and reason's,
Thine are songs of duty,
Home, and healthful beauty;
Quaker wit's demureness,
Drest in spotless pureness;
Carols of the woodside,
Praises of the good side,
Rounds of honest rhyming
Daily service chiming,
Aspirations tender,
Psalms of meek surrender.

Saint of homely feature,
Sanest sage and teacher,
Quiet soul heroic,
Lonely, mystic, stoic,
Though the priest deride thee
Let me bow beside thee.
Citizen departed,
Comrade still, true-hearted,
When we follow faintly,
Come with succour saintly,
Breathe thy music o'er us,
Hold thy light before us,
Aid our soul's endeavour
With thy faith for ever.

W. G. TARRANT.

WHITTIER'S RELIGIOUS POEMS.

IN considering his religious poems it will first of all be recollected that Whittier was a New England Quaker in revolt from Calvinism, whose manhood, from the age of twenty-six to that of sixty, was largely engrossed in the political anti-slavery movement, from its beginning under Garrison, to its close in the reconstruction of the Southern States. His temperament also, will be recalled, how he was "born without an atom of patience" in him, was vehement, transcendental, slow to develop the spirit of reasonableness and equanimity. How, besides, he was affected by the unrest in his religious society, from the Hicksite separation just as he came of age, to the evangelical revivals of later years; and how he was a witness of all the weaknesses resulting from lack of imagination and of mystical consciousness in a church which depends for healthy life on these two possessions. Whittier, who had in him a vein of genuine humour, was a man of fine, intense, but somewhat limited sympathies, persistently devoted throughout his earlier maturity to an unpopular cause, but precluded by temperament, delicacy and lack of early training from long-sustained, systematic mental efforts. He had been set a-rhyming by Burns in his boyhood, and, from his fourteenth year on, wrote fluently and continuously, publishing his verses in the weekly provincial press, and later in the magazines, while at the same time deeply engaged in political journalism.

His religious verses belong to the later years of his life. He was slow in maturing, and produced nothing of any permanent value before his thirtieth year, while at least half of his enduring work was written between his fiftieth and eightieth birthdays, and this period includes all his greater religious poems.

These considerations serve to suggest certain characteristics of his religious writing, its central theme of the eternal goodness, its intensely practical identification of worship with the dynamic force of love, its aloofness from dogmatic theology, and the emphasis it lays upon quietness of spirit. In the present review we must leave on one side those remarkable lyrical outbursts evoked by the struggle against slavery, which will retain at least something of their power as long as men battle against oppression and injustice, and will represent his greatest claim to general recognition, confining our attention to the mystical rather than to the moral part of his contribution.

Preludes, foretastes of his later spiritual joy and song, occur from time to time in the poems written before the War. In "Ezekiel" (1844), for example; but more notably, three years later, when he was in his fortieth year, in "My Soul and I," wherein he bears witness to his sense of Ultimate Reality and the consciousness of the presence of God:

"All which is real now, remaineth
And fadeth never;
The hand which upholds it now, sustaineth
The soul for ever. . . .
Then of what is to be and of what is done
Why quieriest thou?
The past and the time to be are one
And both are now."

The following year, in "Worship," he asserted the identity of love and worship. Three years later, in "Questions of Life," he finds an answer to the problems of consciousness in that contemplative inward silence which reveals the Eternal Presence within:

"To Him, from wanderings long and wild,
I come, an over-wearied child,
In cool and shade His peace to find
Like dew-fall settling on my mind.
Assured that all I know is best,
And humbly trusting for the rest,
I turn from Fancy's cloud-built scheme,
Dark creed, and mournful eastern dream
Of power, impersonal and cold,
Controlling all, itself controlled,
Maker and slave of iron laws,
Alike the subject and the cause;
From vain philosophies, that try
The seven-fold gates of mystery,
And, baffled ever, babble still,
World-prodigal of fate and will;

From Nature and her mockery, Art,
From book and speech of men, apart
To the still witness of my heart;
With reverence waiting to behold
His Avatar of love untold
The Eternal Beauty new and old."

A few years later, in "Tauler" (1853) he asserts—but of "the stranger," not of his own experience—

"I cannot lose the presence of the Lord," and

"Where I go, He goes."

It was not till six years later, when Whittier was fifty-two, that, after much deep and sorrowful experience, he wrote his great hymn of welcome to the Holy Spirit. It was in 1859 and 1860 that "My Psalm," "The Over-Heart," and "The Shadow and the Light" appeared. We need only here recall the theme of the poet's psalm of rejoicing as he enters on the life mystical:

"The West winds blow, and singing low,
I hear the glad streams run;
The windows of my soul I throw Wide open to the sun."

"The Over-Heart" proclaims his own experience of the casting out of fear by love, and from this time forward his poems ring with the recurrent declaration of Divine Goodness; and also, as in these lines from "The Shadow and the Light," of his belief in immortality:

"A voice grows with the growing years:
Earth, hushing down her bitter cry, Looks upward from her graves and hears:

"The Resurrection and the Life am I."

In 1865-6, at the end of the War, came the twin poems, "The Eternal Goodness" and "Our Master." The former is a beautiful protest against the dogmatism of certain co-religionists who had been, as it would seem, dissatisfied with his religious views. Acknowledging his own profound sense of sin and unworthiness, he alleges his unwavering conviction in the central experience of his life, that God is good:

"I know not of His hate; I know
His goodness and His love"; concluding with the exquisite, because sincere and simple-minded, verse:

"And Thou, O Lord, by Whom are seen
Thy creatures as they be,
Forgive me, if too close I lean
My human heart on Thee."

In "Our Master" he declares his sense of the companionship of the Lord:

"The Spirit over-brooding all,
Eternal Love, remains. . . .
No fable old, nor mythic lore,
Nor dream of bards and seers,
No dead fact stranded on the shore
Of the oblivious years;
But warm, sweet, tender, even yet
A present help is He;
And faith has still its Olivet,
And love its Galilee."

But if Whittier thus asserts his sense of Divine companionship, he waves aside all dogmatic definitions and deductions, with the words:

"Love only knoweth whence it came And comprehendeth love."

In "The Clear Vision" (1868) he describes the effect upon the senses of the quickened mystical consciousness after illness. In "The Meeting" he asserts its essentially social character, and the part played for him by fellowship, as opposed to solitude, in worship. Again in this poem, he tells how

"Sometimes comes to soul and sense
The feeling which is evidence
That very near about us lies
The realm of spiritual mysteries."

That his inner mystical experience did not cut him off from communion through suffering and sympathy with his fellows is frequently evidenced, notably at this time in "The Divine Compassion"; while his sense of the infinite potentiality of every man is expressed in "Among the Hills," in which, moreover, he again declares the purpose of God to be "Love, the sole necessity of earth and heaven."

In 1872 he wrote, in "The Brewing of Soma," the now familiar prayer for quietness, beginning:

"Dear Lord and Father of mankind, Forgive our foolish ways!"

He recurs to his master-theme of the Divine Goodness in the verses called "In Quest" (1873), declaring that it is impossible to draw any line between good in man and good in God:

"My best is all Thy own.
From Thy great heart of goodness mine but drew Wishes and prayers; but Thou, O Lord, wilt do,

In Thy own time, by ways I cannot see,
All that I feel when I am nearest Thee."

"A Sunset on the Bear Camp" witnesses to his Wordsworthian sense of the mystical significance of Beauty, and of the beauty of Nature:

"Not vainly Hellas dreamed of gods
On Ida's snowy crown."

This sense of spiritual joy in beautiful things he places first among the blessings of his life in the poem "At Eventide," but "chief" he reckons

"The kind restraining hand of Providence,
The inward witness, the assuring sense
Of an Eternal Good which overlies
The sorrow of the world, Love which outlives
All sin and wrong, Compassion which forgives
To the uttermost, and Justice whose clear eyes
Through lapse and failure look to the intent,
And judge our frailty by the life we meant."

The somewhat diffuse "Vision of Eucharist" and the more concise "Adjustment" and "The Word" play about the theme that faiths may perish but not faith itself, which is based upon the conscious Presence of God; a conception further illustrated in "The Mystic's Christmas" (1882), which speaks of the "spiritual experience of the birth of the Lord Christ within the soul."

In "Revelation" the poet turns, with George Fox, from "the God of Force," "the Cosmic Vastness," to the Presence Within:

"I know He is, and what He is,
Whose one great purpose is the good
Of all."

"Burning Driftwood" speaks of the turning of the soul away from mere fancy and appearance to the Ultimate Reality, and of the faith of the clear-eyed soul in the presence of Death. Again, "The Last Eve of Summer" gives him assurance in communion with a dead friend, of

"... transcendent spheres
And the Eternal Years."

In his last poem, written in his eighty-fifth year to his old friend Oliver Wendell Holmes, he rounds off his work with the words:

"Giftless we come to Him who all things gives,
And live because He lives."

The above résumé of some of Whittier's religious poems* in their chronological order may, perhaps, indicate the outline of his faith and the fountain-head of his inspiration. In marked contrast with the elemental and somewhat impersonal heroism of the cosmical faith of Whitman, Whittier's is often extraordinarily intimate and comforting in its distinctively Christian character. It ministers to the needs of the troubled and stricken spirit out of resources won in the course of a long life of mental suffering and spiritual conflict, resources won not, indeed, by intellectual mastery, nor yet by a native Titanic comprehension of the processes of the universal order, but won through purity of purpose, generosity, sensitiveness, and humility of spirit, and ardour of love.

HENRY BRYAN BINNS.

WESTERN UNION OF UNITARIAN AND FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.—The following certificate has been granted unanimously to Mr. W. B. Matthews, on his application to the Advisory Committee of the Western Union for recognition as a minister:—"Mr. William Bassett Matthews, Bridport, who desires to enter the ministry, has satisfied the Advisory Committee of this Assembly as to his character and general fitness for ministerial work.—Signed: T. A. Colfox, Chairman; John McDowell, secretary. Bath, December 11, 1907."

THE Committee of the Western Union met at Bristol on December 10. Greatly to the regret of everybody concerned, the resignation of the Rev. Rudolf Davis as its district minister was received and accepted. Mr. Davis has held this office for three years and rather more, and in this time he has endeared himself to the assisted congregations, and earned the confidence of his Committee. It was proposed by the President, Mr. T. A. Colfox, seconded by the hon. treasurer, Mr. J. Kenrick Champion, and supported by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford and others, and carried unanimously:—"That the Committee of the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches accept with sincere regret the resignation of their trusted District Minister, the Rev. Rudolf Davis, B.A.; that they gladly remember the earnestness, the ability, and the unflinching tactfulness with which he has discharged his responsible duty both to the Committee and the Congregations in the District; and that they cordially offer him their best wishes for a useful and happy ministry at Gloucester."

* Among notable examples not mentioned above, one cannot wholly omit reference to the autobiographical poem "My Namesake" (1853), the lines accompanying a copy of Woolman's Journal (1840), and "Andrew Rykman's Prayer" (1863).

BOSTON INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS.

THE CRISIS IN THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.*

BY ABBÉ A. HOUTIN, OF PARIS.

WHEN one reads a manual of history, one sees that anxieties of conscience, theological discussions, politico-theological rivalries, have always disturbed the heart of man. At times the struggle is particularly poignant and radical: then an ancient form of religion disappears before a new faith, destined to supplant it perhaps completely. The Christian world is at present, in my opinion, in one of these particularly critical periods. Among individuals the best-informed, among the peoples the most civilised, who by their birth or history are those adhering to the teaching of Jesus, the religious idea, the religious sentiment, have entered into a crisis extremely grave. The Church of Rome, despite its strictly authoritative constitution, has not escaped any more than the other churches, wherever the theories of a free examination have been vigorously applied.

A priest of this Church, I desire to picture to you the particular manner in which she experiences this crisis. You are already well informed, no doubt, on this matter; but, exact as your information may be, I hope to make it more precise and complete on some points, as one on the inside should be able to do for those outside the Church. Need I add that no one loves his Church more than I; that no one experiences more sorrowfully than I its afflictions, or seeks to acquaint himself more exactly with them, in order to aid in remedying them according to his ability, to the fullest degree possible?

The Catholics for whom the traditional orthodox teaching no longer suffices, those who, as a consequence of their historic and philosophical studies, desire that the ecclesiastical authority accord them more liberty of thought and action, are now very numerous and may be separated into three classes.

The first comprises those Catholics, comparatively orthodox, who believe in the foundation of the Church by Christ, the second person in the Trinity, incarnated in a man. They agree that the Pope is the head of the Church, as the successor of Peter, to whom Jesus is reported to have said (to him and, in his person, to his successors), "Thou art Peter (Petros), and on this rock (petra) will I build my church." But, though they are convinced that the authority of the Roman Church is legitimate, they allow that this authority has been sometimes exercised by ignorant, incapable, and vicious men. They hold that there exist in the Church grievous and superannuated customs, which it is necessary to reform, and opinions wrongly founded or erroneous, which need to be modified. One point they have especially at heart. They do not like the interference of the spiritual power in temporal questions. They disavow the Inquisition. The Syllabus of Pius IX. appears to them a manifestation badly made and inopportune. If the adaptation of the old Church to the new social and political order particularly occupies them, in the domain of science, they show themselves imbued with the same liberal principles. They demand more latitude for scholars and savants. They willingly recall the story of Galileo in order to impart to theologians a wise discretion. They admit the inspiration of the Bible, but would confine it to questions of faith and morals. Despite the prohibitions of the Pope, they do not hesitate to declare that, as it concerns other matters, the Holy Scriptures may contain errors. Finally, just as they hold that in political affairs the time for absolutism and the coup d'état is passed, so they desire that questions of conscience be solved by reason, by persuasion, and not by the hurling of anathemas and by excommunication.

The second group is better informed concerning the conclusions of historical science. It knows more exactly what was the teaching of Christ. Jesus believed that the coming of the Messianic Kingdom was close at hand, and consequently he did not found any church. Neither did he dream of identifying himself with the eternal God. He believed himself to be man, and it was only as the consequence of equivocations and misunderstandings that the later disciples adored him as God.

Many Catholics admit these conclusions. They have solved the fundamental problem of the personality of Jesus and reject the mythology of Christianity. At the bottom they are Deists, whom one may call, because of their attachment for certain traditions, Christian Deists.

With other Catholics, finally—this is our third group—the surrender of ancient beliefs is still more extreme.

Many among the members of this Congress may not understand very well the Catholic mind, not knowing, perhaps, that one of the greatest and most frequent temptations which assail the faithful of the Roman Church is that of all or nothing. A God has established upon the earth an infallible Vicar and founded a visible Church, outside of which there is no salvation, or else the anguish and sufferings to which man is abandoned prove that no superior being exists, for a superior being would have pity on him. As God has not founded the Church, neither instituted the papacy, he does not exist. Deism is a mythological residuum. With the personality of God there disappears also the thesis of the immortality of the soul—a myth and an impossibility—and of free will—an illusion. To these ancient terms there is no corresponding ontological reality. But our fathers believed all that. Our civilisation has been founded on these beliefs. We have in our blood ineffaceable traces of them, which will still, although in a less degree, affect our remote descendants. We ought not, therefore, we cannot break with this past. It is necessary for us to let fall very softly these dead ideas or to transport them with precaution into that convenient repository, the history of religions. Looking forward to a scientific era, those who form this third class call themselves Catholics—positivist Catholics, atheistic Catholics, if you will.

These, then, are the three principal categories of those who call themselves at present indiscriminately "liberal Catholics," "modern Catholics," and "progressive Catholics" (les Catholiques libéraux, les Catholiques modernistes, les Catholiques progressistes). In reality, it is only the first group which truly merits this name. Logically, and according to the historical sense of words, the two other groups are not Catholic, are not even Christian. They are such only through policy, and attach themselves to Catholicism by means of a symbolical interpretation, more ingenious than well-founded.

That the true liberal Catholics are consistent in remaining in the Church ought, it seems to me, to be accorded. Since they believe in the divine institution of the papacy, they ought not to separate themselves from her. According to their own theories, all reform, in order to be legitimate and efficacious, can only take place by authority and with its consent. They therefore beseech the papacy to be willing to modernise itself, and they await the issue.

It is more difficult to understand why the Deists or the atheists should desire to continue to make an external profession of Catholicism. But it is a fact. There are many among them, doubtless partisans of the axiom, "A man of probity does not change his religion." Others may equally think that the form of religion which no longer inspires them is still excellent for the masses of the people, and that it is not advisable to destroy it. It may also be that ecclesiastics who have lost their faith retain their livings. Others remain in order to proselytize, in order to work more conveniently in liberalising their co-religionists. Others, finally, go so far as to cherish the idea of alienating the Church itself, of secularising it. The Deists wish to make it a deistic church. The atheists would transform it into a society for moral culture, the guardian of duty, of the moral ideal, which humanity pursues in its endeavours for what is good, and which it expresses, they tell us, under the symbols of God and immortality.

All these Catholics work, speak, and write in order to assure the triumph of their ideas. But the one and the other, even the more moderate, are compelled to use great precautions in order not to offend the conservative religious authorities, and in order not to repel their timid co-religionists, whom they wish to gain to their cause. Such is the extraordinary variety of subtleties which characterise modern or progressive Catholicism. The unsophisticated reader is lost in it. He cannot understand these writings, of which the one appears Catholic without being Christian, while the others are Christian without being Catholic; some, again, express pantheistic, monistic, agnostic ideas in an orthodox form of words, according to the procedure called by these innovators "the reinterpretation of formularies."

Thanks to their prudence, these tactics have much success. The spread of the conclusions of history, and the impossibility of to-day grasping dogmas framed under the philosophical system of the Middle Ages, have given rise to a great crisis of faith in the Catholic world. Those who undergo this crisis are led into this progressist literature which has now followers in all countries. Their most moderate prototype has for his pseudonym "Giovanni Selva," and his sponsor, the Italian

Senator Fogazzaro, says that his true name is Legion. "He lives, thinks, and works in France, in England, in Germany, in America, as well as in Italy. He wears the priestly garb and the uniform of the soldier, as well as the coat of the civilian. He shows himself at the universities, he hides himself in the seminaries. He fights in the press, he prays in the inmost recesses of the monastery. He almost no more preaches sermons, but he holds conferences. He is exegete and historian, theologian and scholar, journalist and poet. He does not always write. He is at times only an impassioned reader; only a believer as also a thinker. He is a republican, he is a royalist, he is a Christian democrat, he is simply a liberal." *

As you know, the ecclesiastical authority is vividly alarmed at the extent and the depth of this crisis.

One can divide the existing hierarchy of the Church into two sorts of prelates, the sincere and the politic.

The sincere take no account of the mortal wounds which history has inflicted on their theology. They believe that an orthodox faith has been committed to them as a sacred deposit, and that the gates of hell will never prevail against them. They also refuse to consent to any doctrinal change.

The politicians in the Church know how criticism has undermined the ancient beliefs and what danger confronts the Church. Certain among them—these are the minority—say: "The Church is wrong; she is dying. Let us end her with honour. Let us give our mother a becoming funeral. Let her dogmas pass away; let us keep her spirit of charity, of devotion, of sacrifice." The others say: "It must be that criticism is the truth, and that truth is assured the final victory. But to confess the truth would be our immediate death. To a suicide we prefer a slow natural death. We will close our eyes and ears to the truth."

The present Pope is not only a sincere man, but also a simple-minded one. He accepts the traditions of the Church, much more than do the ordinary orthodox theologians. In order to give an idea of his mentality, it is without doubt sufficient for me to tell you that he has defended the legend of the Holy House of Loretto, i.e., he believes that the house in which took place the conception of Jesus was transported by angels to Italy.

Also Pius X. does not comprehend why or how the Catholic faith of the Middle Ages should be changed.

After having multiplied his warnings, complaints, and threats, he has declared, in his allocution of April 17, 1907, the innovators to be rebels. "Rebels are such as profess, and repeat under subtle forms, monstrous errors concerning evolution, concerning dogma, concerning a return to the pure Gospel—that is to say, to the gospel purified, as they tell us, of the explicitations of theology, of the definitions of Councils, of the maxims of asceticism—concerning the emancipation of the Church, according to their new manner, without being in revolt, to the end that they be not hunted out. . . . ; finally, concerning the adaptation to the present time in all, in the manner of speaking, writing, and preaching, of a charity without faith, very indulgent towards unbelievers, but which opens to all the way of eternal destruction."

* "Les Idées Religieuses de Giovanni Selva," Demain, Feb. 8, 1907.

"All these errors, and a thousand similar ones, they make popular in treatises, in reviews, in books of devotion, and even in romances; they surround them with certain equivocal terms, with certain cloudy formulas, in order to find a pretext, always on the defensive, of such a kind as not to incur open condemnation, and meanwhile to catch the unwary in their net."

The Pope has also taken energetic action. By virtue of measures which he has secretly or publicly taken, Father Tyrrell, the ex-Jesuit, has not said mass for nineteen months past, Abbé Loisy for eleven months, Abbé Murri for six months. Thus have been deprived of their priestly functions in England the greatest philosophical apologist of the Church, in France her greatest historical apologist, in Italy the apostle who aims to reconcile the Church and democracy. Later, on July 4, last Pius X. has hurled by the Inquisition a new Syllabus condemning nearly all the conclusions of the religious sciences. Finally, in an encyclica issued in the present month, he has repeated the same condemnations.

The outcome will be either to excommunicate at once a great number of heretics, and thereby provoke much trouble in the Church, or to tolerate the innovators, who will continue their formidable propaganda quietly.

In any way, however the Pope may decide, he has before him something which he will not be able to arrest. This is the popularisation of history. With this penetration of historic knowledge among the people the present crisis will become unceasingly more radical and more terrible.

The Church of Rome has surmounted great crises; that of the fifteenth century, when, as a result of renaissance, Reason reasserted itself against the legends of the Middle Ages; that of Deism in the eighteenth century, when, after the awakening of the sciences, Reason began to know the laws of the universe. But these crises took place only among a small élite. Orthodox Christianity was still very powerful. It was able to dominate Reason, which was as yet poorly armed. At the present day the solutions of the problems of Jesus are very clear, and those Roman institutions, the Index and the Inquisition, can no longer shackle the liberty of the press. Sapped in its historical bases, the Roman Church will, like other orthodoxies less marked, be obliged to become a small sect, or to adapt herself to new religious conceptions.

But can the Roman Church thus adapt herself? The Church which declares herself infallible, which imposes as dogmas so many historical errors, which utters her anathema on all attempts at a new interpretation—the Church of Rome, is she not petrified? Can any one hope for another line of conduct on the part of the Popes of the future? There have been learned Popes, tolerant Popes, even sceptical Popes. What attitude have they taken toward the truth? What attitude have they taken towards charity, and especially towards the important question of the reunion of Christianity? As a great historian has said, "It is not always the same Pope, but it is always the same Papacy."

But confronting the Papacy are no longer the humble, respectful, timid men of former times. The new generation is, above all, fond of logic and sincerity. In response to the refusal of the papacy, we hear to-day in France the outcry of the modern spirit: "The Church does not admit that she is mistaken, she does not retreat from a false opinion. To those who demonstrate her in error she responds with an anathema. Rather than extend a hand to justice she embraces Fatalité. For this no mercy will be shown her, and she will drink to the brim the chalice of her stupidities and her adulteries."*

O sons and heritors of the Reformers of the sixteenth century! You see beginning in the Church of Rome, which condemned your fathers without listening to them—you see beginning a religious struggle better informed, and more radical than that of Wickliffe, of John Huss, of Luther, and of Calvin. Great is the sorrow and distress of us who see crashing down upon us the ancient and venerable dome under which we believed we might safely remain. For you, who have never considered Rome as the whole Church, and have held her action to be often only a tyrannical oppression—for you there is nothing surprising in our destruction, our sufferings, and the struggles which we must encounter. Your fathers and you, even you, have known the same vicissitudes, and in the sweat of your brow and the tears of your heart have reconstructed for yourselves religious shelters where you live in peace and full of energy for the service of God and of humanity. In our present anguish your experience remains our encouragement and our hope.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: Deptford.—The Rev. A. J. Marchant writes:—Will you kindly permit me once again to appeal in aid of my Poor's Purse? The poverty of Deptford is always distressing, but it is sadly increased this year by the recent closing of one of the oldest shipbuilding yards, and the consequent dismissal of nearly a thousand employees. The assistance obtained at this season has to meet the needs of the whole year, and I therefore plead for a liberal response. The practical sympathy of new helpers would be much appreciated, as some former liberal contributors have passed away. Gifts of money, boots, left-off clothing (especially children's), toys, &c., will be gratefully received and acknowledged by me at 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London, S.E.

London: Rhyl-street Mission.—Dr. Read makes the following appeal:—"My Poor's Purse is now nearly exhausted, and as there is a good deal of distress in the immediate neighbourhood of the Mission, especially in the case of those families where the bread winner is unemployed through no fault of his own, I shall be much obliged if the friends who kindly send their donations for the Poor's Purse and the various beneficent activities of the Mission will do so as soon as possible. I shall also be glad to receive any gifts of new or cast-off clothing or any kind of warm bed covering that friends may have to bestow, as these are often of more value to the poor than actual monetary help. Parcels should be sent to the Mission, 4, Rhyl-street, Kentish Town, N.W., and letters to my private address, 22, Wiloughby-road, Hampstead, N.W."

Action.—On Tuesday evening, Dec. 10, a very interesting lecture, illustrated by a large number of beautiful lantern slides, was given by the Rev. A. Hurn, on some of the impressions of his recent visit to Canada and the United States. Mr. E. B. Athawes presided, and there was a good attendance.

Bath.—On Sunday evening, Dr. Carpenter, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, gave a lecture in Trim-street Chapel, one of the special course now being delivered. His subject was—Religion in the light of the comparative study of religions, with special reference to Buddhism. The lecture, which lasted an hour, was an impressive demonstration of parallel experiences in the great religions of the world, showing how Christianity could no longer be separated from the rest, as though it alone contained revelation of divine truth.

Bessell's Green (Resignation).—The Rev. F. T. Reed has resigned the pastorate of the Old Meeting House, which he has held since 1902.

Birmingham: Small Heath.—A bazaar, the object of which was to effect improvements in the schoolroom and to assist the general funds of the church, was held last Friday and Saturday. It was opened by Mrs. W. Byng Kenrick and Miss Cheshire. An interesting feature on Saturday was the presentation by the children of the school of money-boxes, into which they had contributed their own savings, varying from 6s. 9d. to 1½d. The sum realised by the two days' efforts (£82) considerably exceeds the estimate of the workers.

Colne.—The induction of the Rev. Hugh Warnock, in succession to the Rev. J. Evans, took place on Saturday last. There was service in the afternoon conducted by the Rev. Principal Gordon. The Rev. J. E. Manning gave the charge to the minister and the Rev. C. Peach the charge to the congregation. The new minister pronounced the Benediction. After tea there was a public welcome, when many friends and neighbours joined in wishing Mr. Warnock and the congregation a long and happy settlement. Mr. J. Wilkinson took the chair, and among the speakers were the Revs. A. Gordon, J. E. Manning, C. Peach, T. P. Spedding, J. E. Jenkins, W. McMullen, Messrs. P. Hargreaves, J. Lowcock, M. Watkin, and Miss Crabtree, who gave a warm welcome on behalf of the School, and said that they would appreciate their new minister in proportion as he kept them all hard at work. Mr. Warnock made a suitable reply, and some items of music brought the meeting to a close.

Colyton (Appointment).—Mr. W. B. Matthews, Bridport, has accepted an unanimous invitation to be minister of Colyton Chapel. He will enter on his duties on the second Sunday of January.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—It has been decided to confine the meetings of this Society in the future to two in each session, a conference and an aggregate service. The annual conference was held on Tuesday, December 3, at Mansford-street, with the president, the Rev. Gordon Cooper in the chair. Addresses were given by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant and Mr. W. H. Ballantyne. Mr. Tarrant, in the course of his address, insisted upon the chief aim of the teacher being the development of "good taste" in the scholar. By this he meant the power of recognising the best in everything, in thought, action, speech, music, &c., so that it became natural for the child on meeting the problems of life to know and choose the highest. This would remain a part of the child's character when the lessons and words of the teacher were forgotten. Mr. Ballantyne spoke on "the use of week-night activities in fostering comradeship," and dwelt upon the useful part that might be played in the development of the young by week-night meetings for some common purpose. Many friendships were thus formed under the wise eye of the teacher, which were a power for good. The speaker called attention to the useful work that the Laymen's Club was doing in this connection by encouraging the formation of gymnasium, cricket, swimming clubs, &c., and said that they were willing to show any school wishing to start societies of this kind how to set about it. The Rev. W. H. Rose, Mr. E. Capleton, Mr. Gimson, Mr. Allen, Mr. E. W. H.

* Proudhon, "De la Justice dans la Révolution et dans l'Eglise," tome iii, p. 150.

Noel, and others joined in the discussion. The meeting terminated with a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Tarrant and Mr. Ballantyne for their help. The annual Aggregate Service will be held in May of next year.

Glasgow.—On Monday, Dec. 2, the Rev. E. T. Russell lectured in the Temperance Hall, Coatbridge, on "Heredity and Environment: Is Man a Machine?"—a question which he answered strongly in the negative.

Hastings (Appointment).—On Sunday last the Rev. S. Burrows, who has supplied the pulpit of the Unitarian Christian Church since the Rev. Gardner Preston left in August, received and accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of this church.

Ilford.—A bazaar in aid of the building fund of the Unitarian Church was held at the Central Hall, Seven Kings, on Thursday, December 5, and was marked by many gratifying features. The Rev. F. K. Freestone presided in the regretted absence of Mr. John Harrison through indisposition. The bazaar was opened by Lady Bethell, the wife of the Member for the division, and on the platform there were also the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, W. Copeland Bowie, Gordon Cooper, C. H. Vine, (Congregational Church, Ilford), H. Davis Bull (Congregationalist, Goodmayes), W. H. Jeffries (United Methodist Church, Seven Kings), and Norman Wright (Presbyterian Goodmayes), Councillors J. H. Souster (vice-chairman of the Ilford Urban District Council), and Adam Wilde. Councillor T. Philpot, J.P. (chairman of the Council) was unable to be present owing to a family bereavement. The Rev. R. Bond (Wesleyan) wrote regretting his absence, owing to circuit engagements, and wishing the sale of work every success. After an opening hymn and prayer by the Rev. Gordon Cooper, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards explained that about two years ago some services were started in Seven Kings at the request of a few friends there and in Ilford, who were anxious for some such gathering for Christian fellowship. It was in that hall they held their first service. But they found it advisable after a few months to transfer the services from Seven Kings to the Assembly Rooms at Ilford Broadway. The church had steadily grown and prospered, and they had a band of earnest, intelligent, thoughtful, and enthusiastic men and women, of whom any church might well be proud. But they all felt it was impossible to make any further progress under present conditions. They realised also that in Seven Kings and Ilford there must be very many who never attended any church whatever. They thought they had a mission especially to these people, and could bring to these souls spiritual freedom. Their aim was not to proselytise from any other church. Their mission was simply to those who were outside the other churches, whom they felt they might help to some faith in God and righteousness and goodness. On those grounds they felt they could appeal very earnestly and very hopefully for the practical sympathy of every man and woman who sought to extend the Kingdom of God among men. They wanted a building were they could worship comfortably and carry on those various agencies which were essential to the growth and the life of any church. They had met with a wonderful amount of practical sympathy. They had received in the way of donations about £440, and he intimated further gifts of £5 from Mr. John Harrison and £10 from Mr. F. Nettlefold, and mentioned that they had secured a piece of land in the High-road. They required in all about £1,000. The chairman warmly welcomed the presence of ministers of other denominations on that platform and the spirit in which Mr. Edwards had spoken of the aims of that congregation. Lady Bethell then declared the bazaar open, with cordial good wishes for its success. The Rev. C. H. Vine, in proposing a vote of thanks to Lady Bethell, said that ministers of other churches, though not agreeing with Unitarians on many points, must recognise them as children of the same great Father, and must welcome into that district every force that made for righteousness. He hoped that in days to come they might work together for the overthrow of wrong, for dealing with the prevailing apathy and irreligion, and for the enthronement of the pure and the good and the true. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who seconded, also spoke of the need of all available forces to oppose the indifference and the terrible evils of society, and said they felt that that little movement might be reckoned on the side of truth and righteousness and goodness, and all that was brotherly and best. The bazaar was continued next day, and in the course of the proceedings Mr. E. R. Fyson, chairman and treasurer of the special committee, stated that the owner of the hall, who was a deacon of the Ilford Congregational Church, had given them the rent charge as a donation to the fund. The result of the bazaar, including donations, has been to add about £200 to the fund.

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—A most successful sale of work, in aid of the current expenses of the church, was held in the school-room on December 4 and 5, and realised the net amount of £91 3s. The sale was opened on the first day by Mrs. W. Wright, Mr. E. F. Cooper taking the chair and on the second day by Miss C. Gittins, with Alderman G. Royce in the chair, all members of the Great Meeting congregation. A very pleasing feature of the event was the providing of stalls by the Women's Friendly Society, the men attending the Sunday afternoon services, and the members of the Men's Adult School. The church band played selections on both evenings, their services being much appreciated.

London: Bell-street Domestic Mission.—The Rev. E. P. Farley begs gratefully to acknowledge W. W.'s kind donation to the Bell-street Poor's Purse, and Christmas funds, and also to thank the anonymous sender of a parcel containing clothing and toys.

London: Forest Gate, E.—The biennial sale of work was held on December 4 and 5, when, owing to the illness of Mr. John Harrison, Mr. Perris opened the proceedings; a friend, the Rev. Wm. Le Pla (Congregationalist) gave an address, full of good sense and liberality. Excellent music was provided, and the sale proved to be the most successful ever held, the receipts totalling £103; expenses, £2 9s. 10d. The amount included contributions from sympathisers in London, Liverpool, Hull, Dover, &c. The grants from the B. & F.U.A. and the L.D.U.S. cease with the year; and the congregation at Upton-lane now enters upon an independent career with courage and hopefulness.

London: George's Row Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers gratefully acknowledges the sum of ten shillings from W. W.

London: Kilburn.—A successful sale of work was held at the Quex-road Church Hall, by the Ladies' Congregational Working Party, on Friday and Saturday, November 29 and 30. On the first day Mrs. Blake Odgers opened the sale, and on the second day Miss Helen Brooke Herford. On the Saturday evening a concert was given in the same hall, an interesting programme being kindly provided by Mrs. C. Granville, Miss Adelaide Dresser, Miss H. Lawford, Mr. Herbert Lawford, and Miss W. Stanley. Friends from neighbouring churches kindly came in to help by making purchases, with the result that the proceeds of both sale and concert amounted to about £85.

London: Stratford.—There was a very encouraging congregation at the West Ham-lane Church on Sunday evening, when the Mr. Delta Evans delivered the second discourse of a special series on "Some of the World's Teachers." His subject was Confucius, and he will speak to-morrow evening on Socrates.

Manchester.—The Manchester District Sunday-school Association arranged for a conference upon "Graded Schools," on Saturday, November 30, and secured the services of Miss Davy, of Leicester, to introduce the subject. Unfortunately a dense fog settled on most of the district in and around Manchester, and many who would have been glad to attend were prevented. The chairman started at 4.30 from Woodley, and succeeded in reaching the Memorial Hall at 8.30, to find the meeting almost over, and those who had won their way through the fog preparing to renew the attempt on the homeward journey. It was all very unfortunate, but the next conference may, perhaps, make up for this almost abortive effort.

Manchester: Blackley.—A sale of work, promoted by the second class of girls in the Sunday-school, for the purpose of raising the balance of the money required for the decoration of the school was held on Saturday, December 7. The sale was opened by Mrs. Simister, and was completely successful.

Manchester: Lower Mosley-street.—A Memorial Service for the late Mr. Richard Wade was held at the school on Sunday evening, December 1. There was a large congregation, including many old friends and former members. Rev. A. Cobden Smith officiated, and in the course of his address paid a warm tribute to the exemplary character of Mr. Wade, and the faithful service he had rendered the institution, which held the first place in his affections during upwards of 60 years. He had been one of that historic fellowship to which John Curtis, Travers Madge, Charles Herford, and others belonged, and of those early workers three remained, namely, R. D. Darbishire, E. C. Harding, and S. B. Worthington. The long and continuous service of Richard Wade was without parallel in the history of the school. The address was followed with close interest. Mr. Thomas Mulliner gave a fine rendering of the solo, "Thou art passing hence," and the choir assisted with appropriate selections of music. The service throughout was an impressive one and will long be remembered.

Manchester: (Middleton).—The Rev. J. Harrison has resigned the charge of this congregation, and his resignation will take effect at the close of the year. The regret of the congregation, and of neighbouring friends, is increased by the knowledge that Mr. Harrison's resignation has been hastened by ill-health. He came to Middleton in 1900, and has won the esteem and affection of all who have had to work with him.

Poole.—On Sunday evening Dec. 1, the Unitarian Church, Hill-street, had its first experience of the electric light, which has now been installed there, and was much appreciated. Eight pendants from the beams, with special lights for choir, organ, and pulpit, distribute the light admirably, and the other parts of the building being suitably provided for, it will be possible entirely to dispense with gas, which has lately proved unsatisfactory. On this evening the monthly musical service was held, with the aid of friends who kindly came over from Bournemouth. The musical items included solos, an anthem, and a trio for two violins and the organ. The Rev. H. S. Solly preached a Temperance sermon on "Saving the Children." The congregation was a good one, though not quite as large as a month previous, when the annual choir services were preached, and there was a good collection.

Scarborough.—Taking advantage of a short visit to Scarborough of Mr. Arnold Lupton, M.P. for the Sleaford division of Lincolnshire, the Rev. Ottwell Binns asked him to speak at the evening service on Sunday, December 8. Mr. Lupton took for his subject that which Mr. Binns had already announced for that evening as his own subject—"Pension or Workhouse." While Mr. Lupton explicitly stated that he was speaking neither for nor against Socialism, he showed that Socialism was by no means new, as the form of government of at least 700 years ago was distinctly Socialistic. He gave many examples of this, and some of the ways in which it is continued to the present day. Having declared the plain moral right of everybody in the land to the opportunity of work, and the means of a peaceful old age, he expounded a simple, practical scheme which he said would only be a small beginning, but would at any rate be a beginning, towards old-age pensions. The address, which was a simple, straightforward exposition of the position of old-age pensions, with the possibilities and impossibilities clearly shown, was listened to with interest and appreciation. The devotional part of the service was conducted by Mr. Binns.

Sheffield: Stannington.—Friends from the Upperthorpe congregation of Sheffield went to Stannington on Monday last and gave an excellent entertainment on behalf of the sale of work fund. The first part of the programme consisted of a concert, which was followed by a little dramatic sketch. The songs were excellent and the sketch full of fun. In acknowledging a vote of thanks on behalf of the ladies and gentlemen who had taken part, the Rev. A. H. Dolphin said that they had come to show their sympathy and goodwill to his friend, the Rev. J. Ruddle, the minister of Stannington, and also to show their goodwill and sympathy to the congregation. He hoped that there would follow many opportunities of mutual friendliness such as should always be between neighbouring congregations.

WHAT MEN ARE SAYING.

WHAT MEN ARE DOING.

WHAT MEN ARE THINKING.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political, and social progress.

What Mr. R. B. Haldane says of "Public Opinion":—

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion," under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed of men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists, the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.—Yours faithfully,

Percy L. Parker, Esq., Office of "Public Opinion," Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

What Sir Gilbert Parker, M.P., says of "Public Opinion":—

Dear Mr. Parker,—I cannot but congratulate you on that excellent paper, "Public Opinion," which I read regularly. You have a journal of great influence and usefulness.—Yours truly,

GILBERT PARKER.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 30 and 31, Temple House, Tallis-street, London, E.C. Specimens free on application.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

NEXT week's INQUIRER, it will be remembered, must be published on Tuesday, because of Christmas Day. All advertisements and editorial matter must reach the office by Monday. We are not eager for any more news or correspondence for that number, for we have already more than enough matter to fill its columns. And for the rest, let us all wish one another a HAPPY CHRISTMAS, and do our best to make it so!

THE meeting held at the invitation of the Manchester District Association, in the Memorial Hall, on Thursday, December 12, for an interchange of impressions among the local delegates to the Boston Conference and others, proved of great interest. The President, the Rev. Charles Peach, took the chair. In the afternoon the subject was introduced by the Rev. J. E. Stead and a free and useful exchange of experience and impression took place. The evening gathering took the form of a public meeting, and it was one of the best held under the auspices of the Association for a long time. The chairman gave his impression in regard to temperance and education in the United States, and expressed the conviction that in both these matters they were far ahead of England. The Rev. W. Holmshaw spoke on the origin, growth, and work of the Women's Alliance. The Rev. J. A. Pearson took for his subject the Young Men's Christian Union, the fine unsectarian organisation which is America's answer to the policy that closes membership in the Y.M.C.A. by a doctrinal test. The Rev. H. D. Roberts spoke on the theological position of the various churches in the States, the Rev. T. P. Spedding on the business methods of the American Unitarian Association, and Mr. J. Wigley gave an account of the Sunday Schools. A full report of the meeting will appear in next week's INQUIRER.

DECEMBER 18, 1707, Charles Wesley was born at Epworth Rectory, and was thus a hundred years all but a day older than Whittier. The chief of English hymn-writers, it is not only in the Church of England, of which he was a life-long member, or among the Methodists, to whose movement his great gift added such vital force, but throughout the Christian world, that his name is honoured and his hymns are sung.

THE death of Lord Kelvin removes from our midst a great man of science, who, in spite of his eighty-three years, was still young and eager of spirit in scientific experiment and research. He was a man of extraordinary versatility, a mathematical genius, equally great in abstruse research and practical invention. A native of Belfast, the son of a professor of Mathematics, he was for more than fifty years professor of Natural Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, and when, in 1896, he celebrated the jubilee of his professorship, the whole world of science united to do him honour. Knighted after the part he took in laying the first Atlantic cable in 1866, Sir William Thompson was in 1892 raised to the peerage, and he was one of the original members of the King's new Order of Merit. While he engaged in profound speculations as to the age of the earth, the ultimate nature of matter and electricity, he was the inventor of the most perfect kind of compass, the best apparatus for taking soundings at sea, a tide predictor, and a water tap that does not jar the pipe when turned off. Lord Kelvin was one of those wise investigators who recognise the true limits of scientific knowledge. At the close of his career as a teacher, after fifty-five years of strenuous research, he made this confession:—"I know no more of electric and magnetic force, or of the relations between ether, electricity, and ponderable matter, or of chemical affinity, than I knew and tried to teach my students in my first session as professor."

THE WHITTIER CENTENARY.

WHITTIER AND GEORGE FOX.

THE hundredth anniversary of the birth of Whittier gives occasion for the acknowledgment of the debt we owe to the Society of Friends to which he belonged, and to which he was always loyal. Among the group of men of letters in New England in the middle of the nineteenth century who devoted their powers to the work of civil and religious liberty, Whittier had a unique position. Emerson, Longfellow, Lowell and Holmes represented that liberalised Puritanism out of which our Unitarian movement has come. We see the inherited Calvinism, after its creedal limitations have dropped away, manifesting itself in a serious moral temper and in a deep interest in all sorts of reforms. There was everywhere the evidence of the contact of the Puritan conscience with modern culture.

But Whittier represented an altogether different line of spiritual tradition. For more than four generations his family had lived in New England as dissenters from the dominant church. To them Congregationalism had been what the Church of England had been to English Nonconformists. It represented what was most hateful and arrogant in religious despotism. The children of the Puritans loved to magnify the virtues of their fore-fathers. Whittier saw the seamy side of the theocracy. He had no reverence for

"Weary prose and poet's lines,
Flavored by their age like wines,
Eulogistic of some quaint,
Doubtful, Puritanic saint."

In lines addressed to the "Parish Popes" of New England, he reminds them of the good old days when

"They bored the tongue with red-hot steel

And flayed the backs of female preachers."

He confesses that he is one who cannot feel much reverence for these persecuting divines, and that he must rest under the reproach of planting "a nettle on the graves ye honor."

To understand both the negative and positive side of Whittier's nature, one must be familiar with the religion which he learned at his mother's knee. Of all the experiments in the religious life that made by George Fox in the seventeenth century was the most daring.

"Now the Lord God opened unto me," wrote Fox, "by his invisible power that every man was enlightened by the divine light of Christ, and I saw it shine through all; and that they that believed it came out of condemnation to the Light of life, and became the children of it, but they that hated it and did not believe it were condemned by it, though they made a confession of Christ. This I saw in the pure openings of the Light, without the help of any man, neither did I then know where to find it in the Scriptures, though afterwards searching the Scriptures I found it. For I saw in that Light and Spirit which was before the Scriptures were given forth that all, if they would know God or Christ or the Scriptures aright, must come to that Spirit by which they that gave them forth were led and taught."

The strange man clad in leather who went about through all England proclaiming such "openings" of the Spirit, carried his principles to their logical conclusion. If Christ was indeed the "light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world," then every man was spiritually independent. What need any longer of priests, and sacraments, and rituals, and creeds? These but obscured the light. Even the Scriptures could only be understood by means of the indwelling Spirit, whose revelations had never ceased. So Fox entered the "steeple houses" and accused the priests of hypocrisy and greed. They were all alike in his eyes—Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Independents, Roman Catholics. He felt that he was called to give his testimony against the whole accepted order of the churches. "I was to bring people off from Jewish ceremonies and from heathenish fables, and from men's inventions and worldly doctrines, by which they blew the people about this way and the other, from sect to sect; and from all their beggarly rudiments, with their schools and colleges for making ministers of Christ—who are indeed ministers of their own making and not of Christ—and from all their images and crosses, and sprinkling of infants, and all their vain traditions."

To the men of that time this seemed the wild raving of a spiritual anarchist. In England Fox was beaten and imprisoned, and Churchmen and Puritans united in persecuting his followers. In New England, where English Nonconformity had got itself established, no tolerance was allowed to the dangerous Quaker. Scourging and hanging was the answer to the doctrine that there could be religion without ecclesiasticism.

But while Fox was still preaching in England, one Thomas Whittier, a farmer on the banks of the Merrimac river, in Massachusetts, joined in a petition to the General Court to mitigate the laws against the new disturbers of the peace. His son, Joseph, married the daughter of the leading Friend of the town. Henceforth the family remained faithful members of the Society of Friends.

The spiritual message of Whittier is the message of George Fox purified from its first crudeness, and interpreted in the light of fuller knowledge. The great protest of Fox was against a "hireling" ministry. He found the Church identified, not with the great body of faithful men and women, but with the clergy. This was true of the dissenting bodies as well as with the old Establishment. Milton had expressed his disappointment: "New Presbyter is but old priest writ large,"

Against all this Fox testified. "As I was walking in a field on a First day morning, the Lord opened to me that being bred at Oxford or Cambridge was not enough to qualify men to be ministers of Christ." He tells us that "the earthly spirit of the priests wounded my life, and when I heard the bell toll to call people together to the steeple-house, it struck at my life; for it was just like a market bell to gather people together, that the priest might set forth his ware for sale. Oh, the vast sums of money that are gotten by the trade they make in selling the Scriptures, and by their preaching, from the highest bishop to the lowest priest! What one trade in the world is comparable to it."

The gentle Whittier, whose hymns are sung in all churches, could indulge in just as fierce invective. When the Church turned its back on the task of reform he prayed—

"Unmask the priestly thieves, and tear
The Bible from the grasp of hell."

He denounced those who, "leaving Lazarus at the gate," are content to "utter hireling prayers," and to "peddle creeds like wares."

In one of the poems of freedom which sting like scorpions he pictures "Official Piety" as locking the door of hope against millions by refusing to take part in measures for practical relief,

"And then

With uprolled eyeballs and on bended knee,
Whining a prayer for help to hide the key."

Whittier is a poet of piety, but no one has expressed more scorn for those who make piety a substitute for justice and humanity. What a picture he gives of that kind of worship which has hallowed the sins of the strong:—

"Then through great temples swelled the dismal moaning
Of dirge-like music and sepulchral prayer, Pale wizard priests, o'er occult symbols droning, [air.
Swung their white censers in the burdened

* * * *

Feet red from war fields trod the church aisles holy
With trembling reverence; and the oppressor there,
Kneeling before his priest, abased and lowly,
Crushed human hearts beneath the knee of prayer."

"The oppressor and his priest"—the paid apologist of oppression—this was the theme to which Whittier returned again and again. That which most roused his wrath was the smug complacency of organised religion in the presence of public wrong-doing. How the spirit of George Fox flamed forth against the clerical apologists for slavery—

"Paid hypocrites, who turn
Judgment aside, and rob the Holy Book
Of those high words of truth which search and burn

In warning and rebuke.

Feed fat, ye locusts, feed!

And in your tasselled pulpits thank the Lord

That from the toiling bondsman's utter need

Ye pile your own full board."

Editor's note:—Here, unfortunately, two pages are missing from the MS. as it has reached us from across the Atlantic. Some 250 words they probably contained, and we must be content for the moment to conjecture what they were. Whittier himself sacrificed much through years of loyalty to an unpopular cause, and his appeal has the greater weight on that account. On the lost pages Dr. Crothers was, perhaps, speaking of those who had not that high courage; and so, in the middle of a sentence, we pick up the thread of his article.

... the editor beware how he protests, or he will lose his paying advertisement, the merchant will lose his customers, the lawyer his clients, the preacher the rich men who pay his salary. To those who feared to take the risks Whittier addressed his lines, "The Moloch in State Street" (the Wall-street of Boston):

"Ye make that ancient sacrifice

Of Man to Gain,

Your traffic thrives, where Freedom dies,
Beneath the chain."

The generation to which Whittier and his friends spoke listened and heeded the spiritual summons. The land was freed from slavery by the efforts of men who were willing to sacrifice themselves for a principle. The struggle, however, has taken other forms. As new issues arise, fresh demands are made upon the soul. The stirring appeals of Whittier come to those who are in the thick of the new contests. For he was the poet not of the "inner life" alone. For him meditation was for the sake of action. Out of "the gathered silence" he would have us come forth to heroic tasks.

"Not to ease and aimless quiet

Doth that inward answer tend,

But to works of love and duty

As our being's end.

Not to idle dreams and trances,

Length of face and solemn tone,

But to Faith, in daily striving

THE CHAPEL OF THE HERMITS.

AN incident told by St. Pierre concerning Rousseau and himself afforded Whittier the dramatic basis of this poem, which speaks with strength for faith in self and God. Climbing together up the slopes of Mount Valerian, Rousseau and his friend had arrived at the secluded Chapel of the Hermits as the latter were reciting the beautiful Litanies of Providence. The two men outside, kneeling reverently under the chestnut trees, joined silently in the act of devotion. Rousseau was deeply moved, and when presently they rose, "At this moment," said he, "I experience what is said in the Gospel: 'Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them.'" St. Pierre remarked, "If Fénelon had lived, you would have been a Catholic." "Oh," was the other's reply, "if Fénelon were alive, I would struggle to get into his service, even as a lackey,

"content to see

How beautiful man's life may be."

St. Pierre, after a life in which the high services he had rendered to mankind and the honours he had won were, to his own mind, outweighed by the disappointments he had met with, had turned, under Rousseau's influence, to the contemplation of Nature, and thus found a path of peace and a sense of divine order such as he had missed among his fellow-men.

"And thus he seemed to hear the song
Which swept, of old, the stars along;
And to his eyes the earth once more
Its fresh and primal beauty wore."

The Rousseau of the poem, with whom alone we are concerned, stands as the type of those who seek to justify themselves against failure and trouble by the plea that their particular circumstances were out of joint. If "earlier born or tempted less," they might have come out triumphant. If only they had had the privilege of drawing breath in heroic days, how gladly they would have followed the lead of the prophet! Yes, to be sure; but who discovered any heroic element then? And what grounds are there for concluding that they would have discerned the prophet more readily than did his contemporaries?

"In his time the stake blazed red,
The poor were eaten up like bread;
Men knew him not: his garment's hem
No healing virtue had for them."
But the glory of it was that, nevertheless,
"Midst fawning priests and courtiers foul,
The losel swarm of crown and cowl,
White-robed walked François Fénelon,
Stainless as Uriel in the sun!"

And even Jesus—are we quite sure that it would have proved to our honour and not to our shame to have "lived with him then"? He who is not acquainted with the Son of Man in his own town and street

"perchance had been
As High Priest, or as Pilate then!"
Our faith's eyes may well be blinded by the dust of the world; at times we can scarce be other than sick at heart by reason of the false profession of them that live at ease, the miseries of the oppressed, and the folly of those who strike for honour, but not wisely. Yet nothing can be gained by renouncing our own post of duty. Have faith in the present! The divine order may be hard to trace,

"Yet, sometimes glimpses on my sight
Through present wrong, the Eternal right;
And, step by step, since time began,
I see the steady gain of man."

With these words the poet rallies his own personal friend, whose light was burning low under the deadening influence of the times. The actual, he protests, is ever the most manifestly divine. Horeb never echoed to the voice of God more certainly than our own hills and valleys. Time's holiest date is not to be sought in the past. It is the present day.

"For still the new transcends the old
In signs and tokens manifold,"
and

"All of good the past hath had Remains to make our own time glad.
Through the harsh noises of our day
A low, sweet prelude finds its way;
Through clouds of doubt, and creeds of fear,
A light is breaking, calm and clear."

Whittier was one of a generation of optimists, and his message to the world was one of confidence and hope. His was an age of great material and intellectual expansion; an age, too, in which his nation made the gigantic and successful effort by which she threw off the shackles of slavery and made serfdom indefensible for all time. Whittier had not the same giant's grip of the ideal that Whitman had, nor his imperturbable sense of the soundness of things at the core. He had not been subjected to the same searching tests of experience. Perhaps he could not have endured them. But he had a very healthy mind, with strong assurance of things hoped for. He believed in an Eternal Order and a gradual unfolding of the hidden wisdom and love of God. Hence he had faith in existing things and people—not a faith blind to contradiction and error, but the faith of the prophet convinced that God's own servant was alive and active in the midst of a perverse nation.

Whittier entertained a consistent view of nature. That which is, is that which has been. In olden days the Creator interfered with His own indefectible order no more than He does to-day. Nor did nature or humanity anciently display a kind of glory they have since lost.

"The heavens are glassed in Merrimack—
What more could Jordan render back?"

* * * * *

This mapled ridge shall Horeb be,
Yon green-banked lake our Galilee!"

And as with Nature, so with man. We cannot evade our proper responsibility by falling back on some exalted personality of other ages. Unwise indeed are we if we ignore the simpler revelations of earth and sky. But trees and rocks and stellar depths are not a substitute for man. The true disciple of nature learns of her how best to serve his kind. He does not avoid his fellows merely to gratify his mind with the pursuit of wonder and beauty. As Whittier had declared his own faith in the present, so he declares for every man's faith in himself. A man's salvation lies in his own hand, in character and service. The suffering of the martyr is not vicarious. It can save no one but the martyr. The saint may afford a holy example and lead the way in self-renunciation. But that is the limit of his power. We must not try to shelter under the robe of Messiah.

"No saintly touch can save; no balm
Of healing hath the martyr's palm.
The key of his destiny is in every man's own hand; and not less because of soulless forms and pampered sense prevailing, does it behove to

"Be the true man thou dost seek."
So the poem ends with the fine lines we so often sing together:

"Henceforth my heart shall sigh no more
For olden time and holier shore;
God's love and blessing, then and there,
Are now and here and everywhere."

THE volume of "Sermons, Addresses, and Essays," by Herbert Rix, B.A., published by Messrs. The price of the book is 6s. net, and copies may be had at Essex Hall,

ENGLISH LITERATURE.*

WITH something of enthusiasm we welcome the first instalment of what promises to be the century's great history of the literature of our race from its first appearance in the annals of the nations. Cambridge has already given us eight out of twelve promised volumes of a "Modern History," as planned by Lord Acton, and now we have the first of fourteen volumes, on the same system of collaboration of many hands, under the joint editorship of Dr. Ward, the Master of Peterhouse, and former Professor of English History and Literature at Owens College, with Mr. Waller, a Fellow of the same college.

There are disadvantages, of course, in this dividing up one work between many individuals, each treating his own department from his own point of view and in his own style. And certainly we should prefer Dr. Ward's own "History of English Dramatic Literature" to a dozen studies of the great dramatists written by a dozen hands. But this method is becoming more necessary every year, and it is almost impossible to get thoroughness in the treatment of any large subject from a single author.

An accurate enough account of our great writers might indeed be written by any man possessed of the requisite learning and ability, but, as the editors point out in their short preface, a national literature, as the expression of a people's character and record of their faith and aspirations, is not contained in the few books which are the outcome of master minds and destined to an immortal popularity. Indeed, these books themselves and their authors are the product of their age and of all that went before, and we cannot fully understand them without some knowledge of their contemporaries and predecessors. Hamlet was not possible until the Miracle plays and Moralities and Histories had prepared the way, and we cannot fully understand Shakespeare unless we know something of his rude predecessors and great contemporaries in dramatic art. Therefore the editors, in their instructions to those who were invited to become contributors, rightly stipulated that "a connected account was to be given of the successive movements of English literature, both main and subsidiary; and this was intended to imply an adequate treatment of secondary writers instead of their being over-shadowed by a few great names."

This volume embraces two periods, the first, from the songs of the minstrels, with which all literature begins, to the work of King Alfred and the English Chronicle; and the second, from the Norman Conquest—which "from a literary point of view began with the years which Edward the Confessor, the grandson of a Norman Duke, had spent in exile in Normandy"—to near the close of the fourteenth century, when the black death had brought about the beginnings of an all-embracing revolution and "the end of many political and religious ideas of the Middle Ages was in sight." Wyclif and those associated with him had begun their work, the poems that go by the name of Piers Plowman had been written and Chaucer was inaugurating the new era with his tales of good cheer and varied morality.

To some there is a special fascination in the weird Prelude to the mighty harmony of English verse prolonged and renewed through the centuries of which we have the fragments preserved to us in the old English poems of Beowulf and Cædmon. There can be little or no doubt that Beowulf dates from heathen times and that the Christian element in it is due to a revision by Christian minstrels. "I cannot believe," writes Mr. Munro Chadwick, the author of the chapter on our early national poetry, "that any Christian poet either could or would have composed the account of Beowulf's funeral." (The body was burnt on a great pyre and a huge barrow constructed over the remains in which was placed all the treasure he had won in fight.) If this be the case, the poem has a yet greater interest as the only literary relic of our ancestors' pre-Christian days.

But it is not only works in the English language which properly belong to English literature. At a time when Latin was still the language of all the churches of Europe, and read by all educated folk, it was in Latin rather than in their own native tongue that those wrote who addressed ecclesiastical or semi-cultured readers. But the writers were Englishmen, telling English stories, writing English history, expressing English ideas. Bede and Alcuin, whose names belong to Europe and the whole Christian Church; William of Malmesbury, and William of Newburgh "father of historical criticism," and all the Chroniclers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; John of Salisbury and Roger Bacon, who might have been Mill and Huxley in previous incarnations; Walter Map, predecessor of the author of "Hudibras," and Duns Scotus whose name is so undeservedly handed down to ignominy in our etymological dictionaries—these and so many others were all products of native thought, though they did not express themselves in the native tongue, and rightly find their place in the chapters on "Latin Writings to the Time of Alfred," "Latin Chroniclers," and "English Scholars of Paris and Franciscans of Oxford."

Yet is it true that these works are in great measure foreign, begotten, so to speak, of a Latin Church on an English mother. Geoffrey of Monmouth is more English, though he too wrote in Latin, for that he tells the marvellous tale of his country before ever the English landed there, and traces the kings of Britain "and sets forth the doings of them all from Brutus onward to Cadwaladr, all told in stories of exceeding beauty," which last clause is the only true one in his narrative, for his tales have won the ear of mankind. Shakespeare has adopted his Lear and Cymbeline, and Milton christened his Sabina. It was he who first introduced Arthur to the world, as a literary hero, presently to become "the centre of the greatest of the romantic cycles." So it is to him, of whom we know little, if anything more than a name, (Geoffrey Arthur, for his connection with Monmouth is obscure), that we owe the central figure of the great Idylls which seven hundred years after his death made the story of his hero familiar to all readers of English poetry.

But what was properly the language of these Latinists, in which they thought and conversed and prayed, as often as they spoke independently of the formulas of the Church? What ought we to call the tongue which Bede used in his dying hours, ("for he was learned in our songs" writes his disciple Cuthbert,) the tongue into which, "for the use of the Church of God" he was translating the gospel of John "till he could do no more"? Was this our own English or rather to be called by another name, Anglo-Saxon, to distinguish it? The question is of more importance than one merely of name, for on the answer to it depends the view we take of English literature as a whole, and indeed, we may say, of English History. That answer is given in the section, "On the Continuity of the English Language," contributed by Mr. Bradley, of the school of Freeman. Bede certainly believed that he was an Angle and spoke Engisc. The term Angluseaxe was in use only to distinguish the Saxons who had come over to this country and were considered part of the "Anglecyn" from the old Saxons who remained in Germany.

The objection to the popular use is not only that it is historically erroneous but that it has, moreover, "the great disadvantage of concealing the important fact that the history of our language from the earliest days to the present time has been one continuous development." Dr. Johnson himself seems to have been somewhat confusedly aware of this, for though he speaks of Alfred's Boethius as the first specimen of ancient English, he tells us in his Preface to the famous Dictionary that "it cannot be expected, from the nature of things gradually changing, that any time can be assigned, when the Saxon may be said to cease and the English to commence." The fact is that our language, as indeed every language of civilised people, but perhaps more so than any other, has been continually enriched and enlarged by foreign influences and has grown and altered naturally in the course of time. It is as a river which is the same from its source to its mouth and rightly bears one name, yet all along its course is swollen by tributary streams and union with other rivers, and broadened by its own increasing volume.

So the chief lesson of this first volume, this Book of Genesis of our literature, is to make us realise that we are one people with those who came across the sea in old time and, like Israel, drove out the people of the land and established themselves in their places. If we do this we shall have a deeper sense of the providence of God in History and of the part of our own race. We, too, are a chosen people, and the annals and legends of our earliest forefathers should be precious to us as are the Hebrew records to the Jew.

We heartily welcome this volume of Beginnings and trust that those which come after will do equal justice to the greater literature for which King and Bishop and monk and peasant and Conqueror prepared the way.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.*

It is well that a life of Abraham Lincoln has been added to the series of the Temple Biographies, in which Mazzini holds the first place; and Mr. Binns, in his independent study of Walt Whitman not only proved his fitness to deal adequately with so great a subject, but was already on the ground, gathering knowledge and receiving impressions, which would be of the greatest service in his attempt to picture the "Martyr-Chief," to whom Whitman was so ardently devoted, and whom Lowell in his Ode commemorated as "the first American."

"I may, perhaps, be allowed to note," says Mr. Binns in his preface, "that, with all its deficiencies, this is, as far as I am aware, the first serious attempt made by an Englishman to portray on any full-sized canvas the greatest of the popular statesmen of the last century, the most notable figure among the leaders of the English-speaking democracy. I have not attempted to do more than to suggest, by way of back-ground, the events amongst which he lived. Even an outline of the complex action of the Civil War would only, as I think, have confused the picture of the man which I have tried to draw."

As we lay down the book there remains with us a very vivid impression of this extraordinary man. We are not sure that Mr. Binns always succeeds in making clear the political situation amid which Lincoln was moving; but while occasionally we felt the need of further explanation, we found our intimate knowledge of the man steadily growing, and at every step, with a deeper admiration.

"Even as a youth Lincoln presented an astonishing figure. He shot up early, and at eighteen stood six feet four in his buckskins and mocassins. He was ungainly as well as tall, and withal, most homely to look upon. His big, protruding ears, standing out from his head, his mop of stiff, dark brown hair which looked as though it had never known a brush, his grey eyes, his large uncompromising nose and big mouth, with humorous hanging underlip, crowned a stalky, big-boned figure, roughly clad in deer-hide coat and breeches which he continued more and more to outgrow." So he first appears, as Mr. Binns presents the child of the Kentucky log cabin and the rough Western youth to us in the chapter on "Beginnings." And that grotesqueness of appearance clung to Lincoln to the end; but it was forgotten when he forgot himself in the passion of the cause he pleaded. His enemies derided him, and the clothes he wore, even after he became President, but through it all, his true greatness and nobility appeared. To an American writer, of Southern family, who visited the President in April, 1861, he appeared "not ungainly in either manner or attitude. . . . He seemed entirely engrossed in the subject under discussion. . . . At my first glance he impressed me as a very homely man, for his features were ill assorted, and none of them were perfect, but this was before I had seen him smile, or met the glance of his deep-set, dark grey eyes—the deepest, saddest, and yet kindest eye I had ever seen in a human being."

* "Abraham Lincoln." By Henry Bryan Binns. The Temple Biographies. (J. M. Dent & Co. 4s. 6d. net.)

It was in 1809 that Lincoln was born, (on the same day as Darwin), and Mr. Binns tells of the poverty and the hard frontier conditions amid which he grew up, and then after they had moved on into Illinois, of how he made his own independent start in life, when "his capital at the outset consisted of his axe, his shrewdness, his muscular strength, and his attractive personality. Beyond these he owned nothing, save humour, indomitable purpose, and the self-reliance of a true pioneer." We shall not give even an outline of the story here. It is admirably told by Mr. Binns, and it must be read in his book. In Lincoln's subsequent career as a lawyer and a politician we see his growing strength, and the deepening sense of a great destiny, which overshadowed him with a profound melancholy, culminating in the agony of the Civil War. As he came more and more to the front, it was without personal pride, but with a deepening humility and utter devotion to the cause of his people.

"Take no thought," he said, in one of his election campaigns before the war, "for the political fate of any man whomsoever, but come back to the truths that are in the Declaration of Independence. You may do anything with me you choose, if you will but heed these sacred principles. . . . While pretending no indifference to earthly honours, I do claim to be actuated in this contest by something higher than an anxiety for office. I charge you to drop every paltry and insignificant thought for any man's success. It is nothing; I am nothing; Judge Douglas [his opponent] is nothing. But do not destroy that immortal emblem of Humanity—the Declaration of American Independence." And on a later occasion, referring to the opposition of the parsons of his own town of Springfield, he declared:

"I know there is a God, and that He hates injustice and slavery. I see the storm coming, and I know that His hand is in it. If He has a place and work for me, and I think He has, I believe I am ready. I am nothing, but truth is everything. . . . Douglas don't care whether slavery is voted up or down, but God cares, and humanity cares, and I care, and with God's help I shall not fail. I may not see the end, but it will come, and I shall be vindicated, and these men will find they have not read their Bible right."

Lincoln, Mr. Binns notes, expressly stated on that occasion that he was not a Christian, in the technical sense; he certainly was not orthodox, but he was a profound believer in the goodness of God and in human brotherhood, while the sense of Divine guidance grew more and more strong within him to the end. There are in this book many passages from his speeches, besides those we have quoted, which show the greatness of his ideal and the passionate devotion which he brought to its service. Of his humour, of his tender-hearted kindness and great unselfishness many instances are also given, and of the strong commonsense and unswerving patriotism of his administration when he came to be President. Then after the bitter trial of the war, and the victory gained for the Union and Emancipation, came the tragedy of Lincoln's death—a tragedy out of which the imperishable greatness of the man rises triumphantly.

SHORT NOTICES.

THE annual volume of Young Days, edited by the Rev. J. J. Wright, is always welcome in good time for Christmas. Throughout the year we have noted more than once the fascinating contributions by the Rev. H. M. Livens, "Listening to the Nature Folk," with their pictures and concluding verses. There are other good things in this volume in the way of anecdote and short stories; and two stories, one, by Mrs. Norway, "A Tale of Two Hundred Years Ago," running through eight numbers, the other, "On the Honour of a Gentleman," through three, in the last of which one cannot say much for the good sense of the master's address to his boys. Vol. 33, this is. (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 1s. 6d. in boards; 2s. in cloth.)

With the Rosebud Annual for 1908, always popular with the little ones for its harmless fun and many pictures (cloth 4s., paper boards 3s.), we have received from Messrs. Jas. Clarke & Co. an attractive volume of "Fireside Fairy Tales" (1s.) and "Animal Gambols" (1s.).

The Welsh Fairy Book, by W. Jenkyn Thomas, with a hundred illustrations by Willy Pogany, seems to be a newcomer in the field, and it comes in quaint and attractive guise. "The practice of narrating fairy stories," says the editor, "has certainly almost died out in Wales, and, strange as it may appear in these days when young readers are so lavishly catered for, it is a fact that no Welsh fairy-book has been compiled for boys and girls." In this book, while in some stories scraps have been pieced together, "nothing has been inserted that is not genuinely traditional." Thus, "Elidyr's Sojourn in Fairyland" is taken from Giraldus Cambrensis, and "Einion and the Lady of the Greenwood" from the Iolo MSS. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

In Parables from Fairyland, by Miss McLaughlin, there is a distinctly fresh and interesting attempt to create a literature for childhood and early youth that shall be worthy of the name. The writer, a member of the Society of Friends, avoids both the extremes into which fairy-books usually run—on the one hand, mere aimless incident which cannot be truly imaginative or poetic, just because there is no truly human meaning in it; on the other hand, the moralising and "edifying" manner. Some sentences from the author's Foreword will show us what is aimed at: "Therefore, for love of the young hearts whose spiritual eyes cannot see and whose spiritual ears cannot hear these things, as revealed by life's experience, the writer has woven the simple fabric of this book of parables; and the design of the fabric is of knights and princes, flowers and animals and fairy gifts, but the threads whereof it is woven are the golden threads of Truth." Elders as well as young folk will enjoy a merry laugh at some of the predicaments of the funny people depicted here. The pictures of prancing knights and lovely ladies drawn by George Soper and Osman Thomas are quite in keeping, and the volume is bound in pretty green and gold. Perhaps young readers will at first be like Vyderl the prince who, when he looked at the hermit, "could not see through his eyes to his heart at all, because all the hermit's thoughts were so high"; for the hermit "belonged to the most beautiful of all the countries of that world, the Realm of Joy." If so, this book will help them to understand. (Headley Bros. 5s.)

Another little book of pleasant stories is Roundling and other Fairy Tales, by Caroline Southwood Hill. The others are three in number, "The Frog-Prince" being a continuation of "Roundling," "The Magic Robe" and "Skylark" are shorter stories, but with clearer moral than the other two. (Seeley & Co. 1s. 6d.)

The Children's Book of Stars, by G. E. Mitton, was written with the warm encouragement of the late Agnes Clerke, who heard every chapter read aloud as it was completed by her friend, and was herself to have written a preface. In her place, Sir David Gill, President of the British Association, offers a word of friendly commendation of the book, as "written in a simple and pleasant style, calculated to awaken the interest of intelligent children, and to enable parents otherwise ignorant of astronomy to answer many of those puzzling questions which such children often put." It certainly is a fascinating book, and the coloured illustrations are beautifully done, so as to kindle the children's eager imagination and attract them to the subject. A chapter on "The Earth's Brothers and Sisters" tells of the planets, and chapters on "Four Small Worlds" and "Four Large Worlds" follow, going more into detail. Then from the sun Miss Mitton goes on to the other stars. (A. & C. Black. 6s.)

Stories from the Old Testament, retold by S. Platt, formerly Lecturer at the Cambridge Training College, is attractively illustrated with sixteen pictures by famous artists; but we do not like to see Solomon J. Solomon's hideous "Samson and Delilah," from the Liverpool Art Gallery, in a children's book. The stories from the Creation to the Return from the Captivity are simply told, largely in the language of the Bible, and without any doctrinal or critical comment. Jonah and his great fish appear as a matter of course with the rest, the idea being simply to let the children become familiar with the stories as they are. The general editor of the series "Told through the Ages" adds a chapter on the history of the Old Testament. (G. G. Harrap & Co., York-street, Covent Garden. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Cambridge Interlinear Bible, the Authorised and Revised Versions printed as one text, with simply the variant passages interlined in smaller type, together with the marginal notes of both Versions and central references, we noticed with much satisfaction when it first appeared, and are very glad now to call attention to a new and cheaper edition. It is the same book, except that there are fewer maps at the end, and it is not printed on India paper. Comparing the two, one sees at once what that means, and the difference is worth 5s. The cheaper edition, however, is quite serviceable, and very welcome. (Cambridge University Press. Cloth boards, 7s. 6d. net, or in more expensive bindings.)

Another Bible from the same Press is the Easy Reference Edition of the Authorised Version, of which the novelty is that, in addition to the customary numbering of the chapters of each book, the chapters of the whole Bible are numbered throughout. Thus Psalm 119 is Chapter 597. There are in the Old Testament altogether 929, and in the whole Bible 1,189 chapters. If, therefore, a teacher wants his class to find Amos 8, and some of them do not know where Amos comes, he will say, "Find Chapter 888," and it is quickly done. But then, will they ever learn the order of the Minor Prophets? (Cambridge University Press. 2s. 6d. net.)

In the Cambridge English Classics Series, the volume of Bunyan's Grace Abounding and Pilgrim's Progress is edited by Dr. John Brown, formerly of Bedford. The title-pages of the editions used for the text are given in facsimile. (Cambridge University Press. 4s. 6d. net.)

A second impression of A Literary History of India, by R. W. Fraser, LL.B., in the Library of Literary History, we take to be not a new edition, for the mistakes pointed out by Dr. Carpenter in a review in THE INQUIRER of July 2, 1898, remain uncorrected. (T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

History in Scott's Novels, a Literary Sketch by the Hon. Albert S. G. Canning, first published in 1905, and now re-issued, takes us through fifteen of the Waverley Novels, in chronological order, from "The Talisman" and Richard I. to "Red Gauntlet" and George III., describing the historical features of the stories. Of "Old Mortality" the author speaks as "this very superior and most instructive story." The book may be found helpful to young enthusiasts in the study of Scott. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

Three more of the De La More Booklets, in ornamental paper covers, come together in a cardboard case—Shelley's Sensitive Plant, Browning's Saul, and Milton's Il Penseroso, L'Allegro, and Arcades. (The De La More Press. 1s. 6d. net.)

Ruskin has been added to Mr. A. H. Hyatt's series of "Authors for the Pocket," and makes a stout little volume of extracts, filling 327 pages. (Chatto & Windus, 2s. net in cloth; 3s. net in leather.)

Feeding the Mind, by Lewis Carroll, with a Prefatory Note by William H. Draper, is an amusing lecture given to a village audience by Mr. Dodgson in 1884, when staying at a friendly vicarage in Derbyshire. The preface tells of this and of some notes once published by the author of "Alice" on "Letter-Writing." Rule 6 is, "Don't try to get the last word . . . (N.B.—If you are a gentleman and your friend a lady, this rule is superfluous—you won't get the last word!)" Another rule is, if you have written an irritating letter, put it aside till next day, then look at it again before sending it, and you will probably put it differently. The lecture is wise as well as humorous in its parallels between the feeding of body and mind. (Chatto & Windus. 1s. net in cloth, 2s. net in leather.)

The Song of Our Syrian Guest, by William Allen Knight, first published in 1904, is sent out now in a new and attractive form, with a coloured frontispiece representing the Good Shepherd. Psalm 23 also is printed on an illuminated page, the booklet being "Our Syrian Guest's" exposition of that Psalm. (A. F. Bird, 22, Bedford-street, Strand. 1s. 6d. net.)

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

CHRISTMAS.

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself."—Luke x. 27.

THERE was once in Spain a farm-labourer called Isidore, who went daily at dawn into the church for prayer before setting forth to work. The other men on the farm, who were idle and careless, jeered at his piety, while his master was angry at what seemed waste of time.

"Faithful service," said he, "is better than any prayer."

"Master," replied Isidore, "those who pray have God to work with them, and the ploughshare which He guides is surest of drawing a goodly and fruitful furrow."

Early on the morrow the master went into the fields to watch Isidore. And what did he see? Here one and there one of his men sullenly following the plough behind the oxen, taking the least possible heed of his work, and having no joy in it. But Isidore was away up on a hill-side, singing like the lark that carolled above him in the grey autumn sky, and with three ploughs turning the yellow stubble into furrows as straight as might be. And one plough was drawn by oxen and guided by Isidore, but the two others were drawn and guided by angels of heaven. You see, Isidore loved and served God with all his heart and soul and strength, and the Love of God strengthened by his daily prayer helped him to toil bravely, gladly, and conscientiously, and to put three times more work into his day than he would otherwise have done.

Now, the great longing of Isidore's life was to visit the Holy Land and see the places hallowed by memories of the Christ-Life he learnt about in the Gospels. So he saved from his scanty earnings, and after many years had filled a leather bag with coins, each of which told of some pleasure, comfort, or necessity which he had denied himself.

One day an aged pilgrim came to his door, and Isidore made him welcome with such homely fare and bedding as he could offer. They talked together long of the holy places which the stranger had visited, and of the joy of walking the sacred ways where the feet of Jesus had trodden. Then the pilgrim wept, and spoke of the long weary journey he had yet to go, begging with empty scrip, ere he reached home. Moved by the old man's tears, Isidore brought forth his treasure.

"This have I saved in the hope that one day I might set eyes on what thou hast beheld. But thy need is very great. Take it, and hasten home to those who love thee, and look for thy coming."

And when they had said an evening prayer together, Isidore and his guest lay down to sleep.

Soon Isidore became aware that he was walking among fields on a hill-side, and on the top of the hill there were the white walls and low, flat-roofed houses of a little town, and an angel in the guise of the pilgrim said:

"Be not afraid. I have been sent to show thee all the holy places that thou hast longed to see. Behold, these are the fields where the shepherds watched on the first Christmas Eve; and that is Bethlehem."

Then the angel took him to Nazareth, "the flower village," where Jesus' boyhood and youth were spent, and the blue lake of Genesareth with its fishing-boats, and the busy town of Capernaum, and Nain, where Jesus watched the children playing weddings and funerals in the market-place. Then they passed to Sychar in Samaria, where the woman talked with Jesus at the well, and to Bethany, the home of Lazarus; and here Isidore gathered a bunch of wild flowers. Then they saw Jerusalem, and the grey olive-garden of Gethsemane, and Calvary, where Jesus died upon the cross. Nay, it was even permitted Isidore to see, as though in a dream, Jesus himself, with kindly beautiful face, talking to the simple fisher-folk, and the village mothers, and blessing the little children. Then all was changed, and Isidore was in the dark hut with the pilgrim lying at his side.

At dawn they awoke, and the old man went away, taking with him the labourer's hardly saved hoard in the leather bag. But Isidore perceived the hut filled with a heavenly fragrance, and on his bed lay the wild flowers which he had plucked in Bethany, sweeter and lovelier than any that grew in Spain.

"Surely," he cried, "it was not merely a dream! Blessed be the Lord Jesus Christ, who has us in his care for evermore!"

And the story means that because Isidore had loved his neighbour, and given up to another what was most precious to himself, he knew Christ as if he had really seen him, and the spirit of Christ as that of a friend would always be a help to him.

At Christmas we feel Jesus specially near us. We decorate our homes and schools and churches in his memory. We read or hear again, and sing in hymns and carols, the lovely stories of his birth. We keep his birthday (as we keep, when possible, all birthdays) with present-giving and cards of greeting, with parties, and holiday fun. But just because we are remembering the birthday of him who showed us as no one else has done the love of God and goodness, and who taught us the blessedness of loving other people better than ourselves, we try specially at Christmas, do we not? to be and think and say and do only what is good and kind, even at the cost of self. We enjoy a great deal of merrymaking, but we also think more than usual about Christ's beautiful life, and try specially hard to be "Christ-like" in character. You children know a little of what that means. As each Christmas comes round, we should know more and more what it means, and, learning more and more from what parents and teachers tell us, or from reading the Bible, or, best of all, from loving Christlike people, try and become each year a little more like Jesus.

For, surely, all the year round, both young and old can feel as Jesus did that we are all children of a Heavenly Father, in whose care we can live with spoken and unspoken prayer, loving the Lord our God with all our heart and soul and strength. All the year round we should unselfishly according to our age and opportunity, beginning with ourselves, and in home and school, and then later in the great world do our share in lessening the wrong doing, unhappiness, cruelty, and quarrelling, and everything that comes from people not loving their neighbour as themselves.

Then will God give us, both children and grown-ups, strength, as He gave Isidore, to put unsparingly and joyfully into our work and play our best powers of soul and mind and body. Then shall we, too, feel Christ with us, not only at Christmas, but every day of our lives, helping us to deny ourselves in order to be and do what is right and kindly.

EMILY H. SMITH.

ENGLISH ARTISTS: VI.—MILLAIS.

NEARLY sixty years ago a number of people were assembled to see the prizes distributed at the Society of Arts. When the name of "Mr. John Everett Millais" was called, what was the surprise of the spectators to see a little boy of nine years old come up the room to claim a medal! He was a pretty, golden-haired child, wearing a tunic and belt, short white-frilled trousers, and a large white collar. The Duke of Sussex, who was giving the prizes, did not notice the boy standing below the raised desk, and remarked, "The gentleman is a long time coming up." Little Millais then had a stool given him, and when the Duke discovered that he was really the winner of a silver medal for a large drawing from the antique, he patted his head and wished him all success, adding that he would be glad if he could at any time grant him a request. Before long, the little artist took the Duke at his word, and asked for and obtained permission to fish in the Round Pond at Kensington, a privilege which was then withheld from the public.

This little boy was destined to become one of our greatest painters. His father was descended from an old Norman family, and lived with his wife and children in Jersey. John Everett, who was born at Southampton in 1829, grew up a thorough Englishman, genial, handsome, and strong, a keen sportsman and rider, and endowed with all the qualities that have made our race so powerful.

Beginning to draw as a child, admitted at eleven years old to the Royal Academy Schools, working indefatigably, and exhibiting from the early age of seventeen, his life was one long series of successes. His portraits were unrivalled by his fellow-artists; some of his subject paintings are masterpieces; his pictures of children and his landscapes are all beautiful in their varied degrees. In addition to the very great amount of work he did as a painter, for many years he illustrated books also, as he held that this was a most important form of art work.

Many of Sir John Millais's pictures are so well known that they hardly need description. There is only one painting in the National Gallery—a very fine portrait of Gladstone. The great man seems to stand before us, with hands folded quietly together and a look of gravity, or even sadness, upon his face.

In the Tate Gallery we have a good many of his finest subject pictures. There is the "Knight Errant," the good knight releasing the poor girl who has been robbed and left tied to a tree. There, too, is the great picture of "Mercy." The soldier in this painting is going forth, ready, at the summons of the monk who calls him, to begin the fearful work of St. Bartholomew's Day, when the Roman Catholics murdered the unfortunate Protestants in Paris. The Sister who clings to the knight is imploring him to have mercy, and not to stain his soul with such guilt as the slaying of the innocent. Possibly, before she became a nun, or Sister, she may have loved him, and therefore hopes to have some influence over him; but the knight is sternly putting her aside, evidently set on doing what he considers right according to the order of his Church.

Then there is the "Boyhood of Raleigh," in which picture Millais painted two of his little sons to represent Walter Raleigh and his brother. The scene is on the Devonshire coast, and glows in the sunlight. A foreign-looking sailor is delighting his two listeners with stories of adventure, with tales of sea-fights and romances which are dear to the hearts of boys. Young Raleigh, the boy in green, sits on the ground, his hands clasped round his knees, dreamily listening, drinking in the sailor's stories, and longing, perhaps, to begin to travel and seek a far-away land of adventure and discovery.

The "Order of Release" has been called "a great English masterpiece." A Scotchwoman, with her child asleep in her arms, brings an order to the gaoler to release her husband. The man, unnerved doubtless by his wounds and by confinement, lays his head on his brave wife's shoulder, and the faithful dog jumps up to lick his master's hand. The gaoler is peering at the order as he takes it from the wife, though she is reluctant to let it go from her fingers; in his right hand he carries the keys which are so wonderfully painted that the rust can plainly be seen on them. The pathetic story in this picture, the brilliant painting, and the careful finish of every detail made it so attractive that when it was exhibited at the Royal Academy a policeman had to be in attendance to bid the crowd "pass on."

A curious picture is "Ophelia"; the poor demented girl floating down the stream with flowers in her hand is less charming than her surroundings. Millais painted the bit of river with its flowery banks from a little tributary of the Thames near Kingston. Every branch and twig, every blossom and leaf and waterweed is most accurately painted from nature, and it is recorded that a professor of botany once gave a lesson to his pupils before this picture when it was on view in the Guildhall, as he said the plants would serve his purpose if he could not go into the country.

Another masterpiece is "The Yeoman of the Guard." The dignified but aged man is the type of an old British soldier. He sits in the sunshine—it may be outside the Tower of London—wearing his gorgeous uniform of scarlet and gold, waiting patiently day by day for his last roll-call. Taken simply as a painting—that is, in the matter of laying on colours—this picture is considered one of the triumphs of the nineteenth century. Scarlet is one of the most difficult hues to paint, and in this and some of his other pictures Millais is acknowledged to have rivalled the Spanish Velasquez, who had, perhaps, the greatest mastery over brushes and paint of any artist who ever lived.

In the "Equestrian Portrait," the horse was painted by Landseer, who was unable to finish the picture, and begged that Millais would go on with it. So instead of the portrait of Queen Victoria which Landseer was going to paint, Millais placed his daughter upon the horse and made a charming picture of her, coming through the archway with her page and her dog.

Honours were poured upon Sir John Millais towards the latter part of his life, but neither honours nor the success that rewarded his work in any degree spoiled the charm and sincerity of his nature. He died in 1896, before he had reached a very advanced age, going to his last home "as he had lived, full of courage and patience, and fearing nothing."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—As President of the Association for this year I venture to beg your help for its funds.

Our group of churches is not large enough to afford a circulation of our books sufficient to make the Publishing Department a financial success, and from time to time we must appeal to known friends for aid in replenishing our exchequer, and "feeding" a work necessary to the welfare of our schools.

The last occasion of such an appeal was in 1898, by the President, Mr. John Dendy, and this met with a hearty response.

Most generous expenditure of ability and time is poured out by our ministers and other friends in the production of these books, whose excellence is acknowledged by many beyond the borders of our churches.

If your readers are good enough to send us a donation, we shall be glad to receive from them, also, a list of schools in which they are interested, and to which a gift of books—class-books and other publications of the Association—would be a boon.

FREE DISTRIBUTION OF BOOKS.

SIR,—Mission Church Libraries, Sunday Schools, Guilds, and similar institutions for the benefit of the poor must need books. Will you allow me a little of your space to make it as widely known as possible that the Literature Committee of the Kyrle Society exists to supply this need? Heavy demands are made upon the Society, but it is more than able to supply them. Books suitable for all ages are constantly being sent out. If missionaries or secretaries of such institutions will write to me, I will very willingly place their applications before the committee.

THE DAY OF PEACE.

FOR more than twenty years the Sunday before Christmas Day has been observed in this country as "Peace Sunday," when many voices have been lifted up, to plead that the law of human brotherhood, which is at the heart of the Christmas message of Peace and Goodwill, should be extended from the home and the homeland to cover the whole earth. And now once more that plea is to be repeated—for international good-will, for the triumph of reason over blind passion, and of justice and humanity over insolent force and self-seeking.

With this wider outlook over the highest interests of man may well be joined the urgent plea for the perfecting of peace at home, and for a goodwill that shall signify not merely a passing gleam of sentiment, and open-handed distribution of good cheer in the light of the home festival, but a determined effort to secure the rule of equity and a true brotherhood.

We have reason for thankfulness this year for what has been accomplished, both in the direction of national well-being and the comity of international life, in the adjustment of conflicting interests between class and class, and the drawing closer of bonds of friendship between nation and nation; but only so much as to make clear the true method for such endeavour, and to give confidence that with yet more determined effort great things may be done for the righting of our wrongs, and for that Kingdom of which the Christmas festival is the constant prophecy.

Now the call comes, to make our confession of Christian brotherhood effective, to seek wisdom that shall clearly see the true laws of life for a community, with goodwill to obey; that a deepened sense of the common good may harmonise all conflicting interests, and give us strength to strike at the root of long festering evils. We must give so as to be sharing the best gifts of life, a home-life worthy of the name, opportunities for training independent, self-respecting manhood, for all alike. Then will the way be opened for a true national rejoicing, worthy of the Christmas joy and peace.

A CHRISTMAS SERMON.

THE WOMAN QUESTION.*

BY THE LATE DR. ALBERT KALTHOFF, OF BREMEN.

[Note by the Translator.—I was three weeks in the town of Bremen, that almost independent little republic that lies just within the coast line of North Germany. I went to hear many sermons, both because I felt interest in the standpoint of the more radical preachers in the Protestant churches of Bremen, and also because I wished to improve my knowledge of the German language. For this reason I also attended lectures. Soon the name of Kalthoff found its way to my memory and stayed there. A lecturer would quote a long passage from Dr. A. Kalthoff's writings; a preacher would take one of his sentences for the text of a sermon; others would refer to their late colleague and friend with such deep respect and affection that one desired to know more of a personality whose influence seemed to survive the death of the body. One felt that these strong men had been strengthened by contact with this personality, that they had found one of the channels of the river of life, and still drank of its waters. I got some books written by Dr. Kalthoff. In one I found the following sermon, preached at Christmas about ten years ago on a question which does not seem to be settled yet. Perhaps the interest of a foreign point of view may help English readers to forgive a somewhat clumsy translation.]

"My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour. For he hath regarded the low estate of his handmaiden; for behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed."—LUKE i. 46-48.

Among the many problems which together make up the social problem, that of Woman fills an ever larger space. It is not so many years since they had to be prepared for scorn and derision who held that in the social and economic condition of woman all was not as it should be, and even dared to say that the position of woman in the future must be different from what it had been hitherto. But to-day, among earnest men and women of the highest culture, there is unmistakably a movement in the opposite direction, so that the justice of the question at least is recognised, and consequently the necessity for its discussion. And we see here once more how a great matter of universal human importance is not to be killed either by silence or mockery. The fact is, this woman problem is here, and it stands not merely on paper, in newspapers, and books, which speak of it in language which grows ever more distinct. No, it is flesh and blood; it is living, and knocks at our doors, it stands embodied before us in our daughters; their very life is itself part of the problem.

My friends, on Christmas Day the woman problem meets us in its true and purest form; but on that very account, also, with the whole weight of its seriousness.

* From the volume "An der Wende des Jahr, hunderts," Twenty-six Sermons on the Social Conflicts of Our Time, preached in the Church of St. Martin, Bremen. Published in 1898 by Schwetschke of Berlin; to be had now of Max Altmann, Leipzig.

What, indeed, would the festival be in our houses without the women, for they it is who, with their eager love, give it its true consecration and its very soul. And when under the Christmas tree, our children build the manger with the Holy Family, is not then another part of the woman problem, the mother with the Christ-child in her lap, the centre of all their eager doings? And wherever to-day a heart that has grown old and hard is even slightly stirred by the Christmas joy, and the spirit of the season, where faded memories of childhood days, of past happiness, and blessing rise up once more; there, also, a woman's form appears, in that tender light of memory,—the mother—representing not a "woman question" alone, with all earthly sorrows and cares, but at the same time a "woman answer" transfigured in the light of the eternal love of God.

Let us not forget that the ultimate roots of the woman problem are combined in Christianity itself, in that great stirring of the human soul, the birthday of which we celebrate to-day—the movement which, gathering up into itself all the living forces of the ancient culture, raised the whole of human life on to a higher plane. In whatever way we interpret the sayings of Jesus concerning woman, whether we hold particular sayings to be genuine or spurious; whatever may have been the opinion of the great Apostle to the Gentiles on the subject of marriage or celibacy, the classical and undoubtedly genuine interpretation which history itself has given of the nature of Christian womanhood, is set before us in the ideal of the early church—Mary—who for centuries ruled the hearts of the Christian nations. Rightly to appreciate this feminine ideal of the early church is no longer very easy for us modern men, who no longer think with the imagination, but with the understanding. The Queen of heaven, the blessed Mother of God, the pure Virgin, of whom the Saviour of the World was born; these are about the worst stumbling blocks which the Church can offer to the thought of the present day; and yet millions of human beings have felt no difficulty, but where we stumble, have worshipped with the greatest fervour and devotion.

This Mary, indeed, embodied for her time, the solution of the woman problem. She preached to the Christian nations a new charter for women and a new standard of their worth. Ancient culture had worshipped physical beauty in Venus, the symbol of its feminine ideal—now women received recognition of their spiritual and moral worth in the pious adoration bestowed on her who gave the Son of God to the world; and in the person of the Mary of the Christmas legend, all womanhood raises its song of praise. "He hath regarded the low estate of his handmaiden. For behold, now from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed." It was something new for woman's place in life that she herself should be sanctified by the sacred life of God, which in the holy human child was born of her.

But full of contradictions, like the whole mediæval conception of the world, was this woman type of the Church. Its aim, indeed, was to ennoble women, thinking to glorify marriage through celibacy, and the vocation of a mother through the life of the Virgin. By this, however, it degraded Nature and the physical life of man, to surround it afterwards with the halo of an external heavenly glory which did not properly belong to it. So the feminine ideal of the Church became at last the nun, who had broken off all personal connection with natural life in order to dedicate herself to the service of the heavenly Virgin. In the life of the cloister mediæval Christianity ultimately found its solution of the woman problem, and pronounced its final word on the worth and vocation of woman.

We ought not to judge this result of the mediæval woman movement by the standards of our present-day social life, still less by the exaggerations exhibited in some of its later developments. In the cloister a woman found not only a secure position in life till the day of her death, not only a sure moral support in an ordered fellowship, but at the same time a wide field of honourable activity; and it is impossible to say how much admirable woman's work, how much blessed service for humanity has issued from these Church organisations of women.

Yet it was not after all the woman as such who thus received the Church's sanction, and the recognition of her moral worth, but only the nun, who had taken the vow of life-long celibacy. Therefore, in the onward course of history, the woman, the mother, rose in revolt against this setting of herself in a lower place than the virgin, and with this revolt begins the woman movement in Protestant culture. It led out from the cloister, into the world, into the home; and it is Luther himself who stands at the head of the movement. He proclaimed unreservedly, in face of the asserted higher dignity of maidenhood, not merely the divine right of marriage, but its higher right and higher dignity as opposed to celibacy, and claimed marriage for woman as her true destiny and natural vocation.

This was a far more radical and revolutionary emancipation of women than the most radical advocate of women's rights can bring forward to-day—the emancipation from canonical law and the age-long sacred authority of the Church. Thus Protestantism created a new ideal of womanhood, the homely ideal of the house-wife; and we should be no children of the new age if we did not honour this ideal and recognise in it a new stage in that historical development which Christianity brought into the world.

And yet this house-wifely ideal cannot be the last word on the woman question, for once again it is not woman as such, as a human being, as an intellectual and moral personality, who appears at the centre of life; but woman in a special social character. And so the modern woman movement goes beyond both the former ideals of womanhood essentially in this, that woman claims what is her due not on the ground of a special social status, whether married or single, but as a human being; and in her woman's rights asks the recognition simply of her human right and human dignity.

Whatever else may attract our attention in the woman's movement—particular claims as to citizen rights; claims on the State and on society, on trade and profession—these are only applications of the general principle to special circumstances in present-day life. How far these demands are justified in fact, how far they are practicable to-day in the present state of things and with the present condition of the female sex; what means of obtaining the fulfilment of these demands can, or ought to be adopted so as to avoid what so often happens, that the most zealous friends of a good cause do it the greatest injury; whether the movement, as the educated classes think, must be carried on downwards from above, or, as the proletariat says, upwards from below—all these, and many others, are questions of secondary importance, about which people may dispute and be of different opinions. They are questions put by people who, with all the good will in the world, only see one side of life, and, for the most part, see even that side from a narrow point of view. But the woman problem itself, now clearly set before us as the innermost kernel of the modern woman movement, is not set by man, but by Time itself, or rather by God, who is the Lord of Time.

Do not let your judgment on the woman problem be disturbed by the foolish talk of those who have invented and spread abroad the fable that woman in the woman's movement wishes to discard her sex, and to become a man, or at least half a man! Not a man, but a human being does she desire to become. She claims for her human nature just what the new era has acknowledged to be the inalienable right of humanity; the free development of her own personality, complete emancipation and responsibility, the right to a share in everything by which human life can be raised and ennobled. She asks only that the way may be opened to her, in which, as woman, she may prove her strength, in which she may bring her womanly individuality to its highest and fullest development, unconcerned by the accident of her station in life. Woman, in the modern woman movement, raises her protest against the limits set to her development by man with his one-sided decree: "Thus far and no further." She will no longer be man's appendage, but justify her own existence. She demands that the sphere of woman's life and action should no longer be determined with reference to the egotism and the convenience of man, but only with reference to her true nature, as its power and individuality may be proved and cultivated in the free development of life.

My friends! does not a great thought for humanity lie hidden in this modern woman movement. While man in the nineteenth century has struggled to understand his position in the world and his relation to his fellow beings, does it not occur to us, inevitably, that at least half of human kind, perhaps even more, are women, and forthwith our conscience is stirred. If this half of human kind are also human beings, can men claim to be their only representative in the civil community? You know what, broadly speaking, the judgment of man has been as to the sphere of woman's life. Where men have judged from their own standpoint, and women have not known how to vindicate and maintain their own distinctive worth, it has been, in spite of all romantic love songs, a judgment lamentable and degrading enough. The woman of the upper classes was treated as the plaything or adornment of the house, the woman of the lower classes as beast of burden or prostitute. From cloister to factory—these are the two poles which indicate the path that woman has trod from the middle ages to modern times; and this path, in spite of those who paint such gruesome pictures of woman's lot in the cloister, must surely be described as a path from heaven to hell. Even that which is offered to the woman of the present day under the name of marriage, in ninety cases out of a hundred, does not appear in any sense to be a raising of the ideal of the Middle Ages. We no longer have the halo of the mediæval Madonna; but with the outward mark of sanctity much that was really holy in the love and life of woman has also disappeared.

Yet God in history ever takes His own way, and that way goes upward and onward, even where, to human eyes, it seems to go downward and backward. It is yet the way of freedom and independence, the way of humanity, which the one half of mankind has already recognised as the right and true way, along which God will now lead the other half also. It leads not back into the cloister, nor yet into the house, to marriage; not, in fact, to any outward condition of life, but into the heart, into the depths of the human spirit, out of which everything that is good and great for all women in every condition of life will come. And if life has gained infinitely through the uplifting and deliverance of one part of mankind, how much more will it be enriched when in the other part all germs and faculties attain to a joyous thriving and vigorous growth.

Every oppression injures not only him who suffers it, but even more him who inflicts it. All sins against women that men have upon their conscience, revenge themselves in the curse which woman is able to bring upon man. By contempt of woman man robs himself of the spiritual strength which flows out to him from a noble woman's life. So long as woman is not recognised as the spiritual equal of man, she draws him down to the sphere of the lower sensuality; she becomes a Delilah who cuts off the mighty Samson's locks, so that the Philistines can fetter and blind him; she becomes the domestic cross that burdens him, so that when God calls him to great and holy duties, he has to give the shameful answer: "I have married a wife, and therefore I cannot come!"

We need women with capacity to act even without men, capable in themselves, with their own strong great will; then we shall have women who can act efficiently with men, whether co-operating with them in every field of beneficent human activity, or in the partnership of marriage and the home.

We hear frequent laments over the decay and destruction of family life, that deepest root of national strength and national well-being. Those who utter such laments seldom realise themselves how fully justified they are. But I know of no more effectual means for removing the cause of this complaint than the training in woman of a strong free character, which shall remove from our homes the shame of seeing marriage brought down to the level merely of an institution for providing the necessities of life.

A woman who is strong enough to provide for herself, gives a new meaning to the life of housewife and mother. To the ideal of the mediæval woman she unites that of the modern home, and so produces the new ideal of the "eternal human," which for the first time gives its full worth to the "eternal feminine."

Men and women of this congregation! Christmas is the festival which preaches the ancient truth that it is more blessed to give than to receive. You will all have taken care, as far as in you lay, that of gifts there should be no lack. Women's hands have worked through long weeks in order to give us, the husbands and brothers, a happy Christmas! Thanks and honour to you for it all! But more than all the artistic skill of your hands we men desire thought that shall bring us tidings of a noble, spiritual life of your own; we desire that while you are giving yourselves all this trouble and care over your busy work, you should not forget that "one thing is needful!" And you, wives and daughters, you have the right to ask of us men more than that we should give you gold and silver—that we should give you also that which is better than gold and silver, our spiritual world, our best thoughts, our loftiest aims and aspirations. Would that there might be ever more of such mutual giving and receiving between men and women! That would be the best and truest solution of the woman problem, a joyful, blessed Christmas festival for humanity.

LOVE COMES TO SING.

Love comes to sing her song of Hope and Cheer,

Peace and Goodwill;

Perfect in power, she casteth out all fear,
Our hearts to fill

With holy thoughts, to uplift, redeem and guide,
And make our homes her Heaven this Christmastide.

Love comes to sing her gentle, sweet refrain—

Forget, forgive;

The grief is past—the darkness and the pain;

To-day we live,

Live with the Man of men, our Brother-Lord,

And find, in following Him, Love's great reward.

Spirit with spirit speaks, and Love still sings

Her song of praise;

Blessed with God's own gospel, lo! she brings

To human ways

A heavenly rapture, so that we be drawn
Up to the heights, and see His Kingdom dawn.

Christ comes again, the Inspirer of our Faith,

The King of Love,

To fix our hearts on joys that know not death

Here and above;

To make all praise and service, now and then—

Glory to God, Peace and Goodwill to men.

Christmas, 1907. J. L. HAIGH.

A CHRISTMAS HYMN.

If you should ask any Dane to name the hymn best loved and most used in his country, I feel certain that without hesitation he would answer you, "Dejlig er Jorden." It is a kind of national pilgrim's song sounding through our church, whenever any single child of the land or the whole country comes to ask its blessing, and whether the occasion be joyful or sad.

But there is no doubt that it was originally written as a Christmas hymn, and as such, too, it stands forth paramount amongst all other hymns. It rings through the country on Christmas Eve, and on Christmas morning the air seems filled with it.

Being no poet I cannot render it into English in its beautiful, graceful form, but I cannot refrain from giving the words, so interwoven in the history of my personal life and in that of my people:—

Fair is the earth!

Grand is God's heaven!

Lovely the pilgrimage of souls!

Through the beauteous

Realms of earth

Go we to Paradise with song.

Ages shall come,

And ages shall pass,

Man shall follow the steps of man,

Never shall die

The Note from Heaven

In the soul's joyful pilgrim song.

Sung by the angels

First for the shepherds,

Joyful from soul to soul it rang:

Peace on earth,

Man rejoice,

To-day a Saviour is born to us.

There was a time when I thought that I could not honestly sing this hymn, this last verse seeming unreal in my mouth. Thank God, that time is past and gone, and I can sing it now from my very inmost heart. I say "thank God," for it is indeed a great blessing when, in ripe manhood, the old ties of childhood, that for years were ruptured and broken, are reknitted, once more a source of help and support, when the wings that bore your young soul after intervals of impotency can again lift you and carry you heavenwards; when an old love, shrivelled and withered, left a useless burdensome relic in a dark corner, puts forth new leaves, blooms anew with the old splendour and fragrance. Yes, it is indeed a thing to thank God for, when your pilgrimage through the world of knowledge and science leads you back once more to worship in the dear, old, simple words of your youth.

When first I acknowledged the simple manhood of Jesus of Nazareth, words like "Christ" and "Saviour" seemed to me banished for ever from my vocabulary. My lips were closed when ever they appeared in the hymns and prayers of my childhood, still dear to my heart, still the natural, most adequate expression for my religious moods and aspirations. Trudging on in my search for the truth about the religious guides, the teachers, the ideals of my childhood, my eyes were soon opened to the actual worth or worthlessness of the Gospels as historic documents, and I stood bewildered and mournfully thinking: Must I lose these, too; does truth demand even this sacrifice of me? Then it was that my Heart came to the rescue. Its voice rang out strong and clear. "Look!" it said. "Let Reason and Science dissipate the mist, let them tell you all they can about these precious old documents, their origin and history; listen to them loyally and faithfully, but hear then what I have to tell you. In the Gospels you possess the highest, truest revelation of all the things that eye cannot see and ear cannot hear, about which Reason and Science can tell you nothing, of the one living God, of the soul of man, and of the relation between God and the soul. From these old pages stands forth living and real the Son of God, the ideal man, the Saviour of your soul."

And I turned to Reason and said: "Listen to what the Heart says." And Reason replied: "Your Heart is right; go to Science, and let her tell you what wonders this Christ of the Gospels has wrought into the history of man. Look around you, and see how great is his influence even in this day. Look into your own life, and see what his words and teaching, he himself has been to you, what he has done for you." I did as Reason told me, and this is what I saw: That out of the 1,600 millions inhabitants of earth 550 millions profess themselves Christians; that almost all the nations that have adopted the Christian religion have risen to a high culture; that no other religion has ever displaced the Christian religion from countries where once it was rooted; that for more than 1,800 years many of the world's keenest thinkers, most eminent scholars, and greatest religious geniuses have occupied themselves with the New Testament and its mighty central figure, trying hard to distinguish between what is genuine history and what poetic or polemic additions in its pages, striving to understand and rightly interpret the words there written; that at this very day this work is carried on with as much zeal and devotion as ever before; that every child in Christendom has heard about Jesus of Nazareth, about the child in the manger, about the Saviour on the cross, and that few if any have attained manhood without words of his having been on their lips; that myriads have been saved, have won peace of heart and soul, by turning to the Christ of the Gospels; that this mighty spiritual movement, this forming, educating, edifying power, which we call Christianity, has its origin in the small, unknown Galilean villages; that the "Menneske-deal" Christ, was born into the world among the poor artisans and fishermen who, 1,900 years ago, lived on the coasts of the Galilean lake. How much of the vitality and power of Christendom is due to the Evangelists, to St. Paul, to the Church Fathers of ancient times or present day; how much each of these men, and many others with them, have contributed from their own store of fuel to the fire once kindled, no one can say, but this stands fast: That 1900 years ago a light was lit in Palestine, which at this day shines out bright and clear over the whole earth.

Then I looked into my own life, and I saw how, time upon time, when the rain descended and the floods came, and the wind blew and beat upon my house, the rock upon which I had been saved was words out of the Gospels. I recalled the untold moments in my life when the words of Christ's immortal prayer had rescued and subdued my trembling, revolting heart. I remembered what that wonderful picture of the father, running with outstretched arms to meet his erring, repenting child, had been to me.

I lifted my head, and I heard the Note from Heaven vibrating all around me in the air. And from the fulness of my heart I sang:

Peace on earth,
Man rejoice,
To-day a Saviour is born to us.
MARY B. WESTENHOLZ.

A CHRISTMAS QUESTION.

THERE is a touching story told in the Gospels to the effect that when the faithful John the Baptist was in prison and expectant of his doom, various rumours—some encouraging and some disquieting—were brought to him concerning the doings of the man who had taken upon himself to be John's successor. Troubled in suspense, he at last asks two of his friends and disciples to go to Jesus and ask him the question direct: Art thou he that should come, or do we still await another? By making this direct appeal John believed he would settle the question once for all whether the Messiah had come, and he would be able to direct his disciples accordingly. Great questions are not so easily solved. It was easy to think, This man is or is not the Messiah. It was probably less easy to decide in a moment when the answer came back: We were to go and report to John the things we had seen, that the blind are made to see and the deaf to hear, the dead are raised and the poor are consoled. Whether any of these or all of them were sufficient to convince John that the Messiah had come, who shall say? He may have had a thought analagous to that which is ascribed to the brothers of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel: "If thou do these things show thyself to the world." If thou do the deeds of the Messiah, assume his rank, proclaim thyself. John was doomed to die before this question of Messiahship should approach any nearer to a solution.

In truth John's question touches a problem not solved yet. A hundred little tokens all about us just now remind us that Christmas is close upon us. Our Christmas oratorio has long been announced. The strains of the overture and the clear, bold utterance of the prophetic "Comfort ye" are already singing themselves in our memories; we anticipate in many ways the festival to come.

With the thought of Christmas comes the thought of all that Christ has been and that Christianity has claimed to be in the world. Men tell us that through him has been proclaimed the forgiveness of sins, in his name miracles of spiritual healing have been wrought, by the simplicity of his sayings and the sweet purity of his life the young have been trained to love goodness, while the wicked have been abashed and humbled by the power of his cross. They tell us that through the influence of Christ civilisation has become more humane; that even punishment of crime, and the conduct of war have been affected by the spirit of gentleness which is characteristic of Christianity; that ambition itself is less unscrupulous and vengeance less cruel since Jesus came into the world. Certain writers have attempted indeed to show that the gains of Christianity have not been made without some sacrifice of ideals that had been better preserved; and they have no difficulty whatever in proving that at the least Christianity has failed approximately to attain its own ideals. "In the twentieth century we have the spectacle of Christian Europe maintaining fifteen million of men for the purpose of war." The recent annual institutions of Temperance Sunday and Peace Sunday do not indicate days set apart for thanksgiving for reforms achieved, but days expressly set apart in order that the urgent pressing need of reforms may be confessed and insisted upon. Yet Christ has been among us for hundreds of years. He is born again in our imagination, and saluted as Saviour of mankind every Christmas morning. In his name a happy holiday is celebrated. For his sake every effort is made to provide for a few hours at least food for the hungry, mirth for the joyless, beauty for ashes. How is it, if allegiance to Christ is not the vainest lip service, if the influence of Christ is not purely illusory, how is it that the Christmas festival itself cannot be redeemed from its accompanying follies, but especially why cannot the spirit of Christmas rule in men's hearts for more than one day, or one brief holiday week?

We must reconcile ourselves to the truth. John Baptist's question may be answered in the affirmative (as they say in the House of Commons), but we have, notwithstanding, to look for another. Let us say, we have on that very account to look for another. The healing of a few of the distracted and possessed in Galilee must have helped to call attention to the numberless cases where people of various infirmities were left unhealed. The very improvements that have been wrought by the spirit of Christianity only emphasises the demand for greater blessings. If mercy and compassion rule on festival days, that very fact gives point and emphasis to the demand for justice all the year round.

Long enough our evangelists have been shouting to men, Ye must be born again. In return the answer goes back to the very Christ: Thou must be born again. Our wants are more numerous, our life is more complex, our dissatisfaction with self is deeper than ever it was. We are grateful enough for the memory of the past. We stand reverently and sing or hear our Hallelujah Chorus once a year, but we shall never be fully content till the modern Christ has appeared—one tempted in modern ways, suffering under modern conditions, triumphant over modern obstacles. Ring in the Christ that is to be.

MANHOOD begins when we have in any way made truce with necessity;—but begins joyfully and hopefully only when we have reconciled ourselves to necessity, and thus in reality triumphed over it, and felt that in necessity we are free.—Carlyle.

BOSTON INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS.

THE SITUATION OF THE CHURCHES IN FRANCE AFTER THE SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.*

BY PROF. JEAN RÉVILLE, OF PARIS.

THE paper which I have the honour of presenting to this Congress does not refer to the new organisation which the Protestant churches of all denominations have elaborated in France since the law on the separation of Church and State began to have force. My honourable colleague, Professor Bonet-Maury, undertook to speak on that subject before the Congress. He will also explain to you the endeavours that were made to unite the different Protestant denominations.

My task is an attempt to describe in a general way the consequences of the separation law on the religious and ecclesiastical situation of France, and, as the great majority of French people belong to the Roman Catholic Church (at least by name), it is of that Church that I shall speak mostly. The experience that has just been had in France is of such importance to the Old World that it is worth while for men of all lands to interest themselves in it.

In the paper I read to the Geneva Congress in 1905, before the definite vote of the law, I said: "Its worth will above all depend on the manner in which it is applied. With a liberal and tolerant government it can strongly assure the freedom of conscience, but with a clerical or with an unreligious government it may become a terrible power of oppression."

Now my first statement, after nearly two years' trial, is that the law has really been applied in a thoroughly liberal manner.

My second statement is that in general it has not throughout the whole country raised such disturbances as its antagonists had prophesied and as I myself at Geneva feared. There have been local agitations, partial disturbances, attempts at resistance, made in certain small groups of society. But, on the whole, the great bulk of the nation remained perfectly calm in spite of all endeavours to arouse them against the law.

We can each day observe that the mass of the people is far more agitated by ideas of social reform than by the separation of Church and State. The coolness of the Catholic faith in the French people, especially amongst men, may account for this in a large degree, but also and chiefly the wide and liberal manner in which this important ecclesiastical reform was carried into execution. Freedom of conscience has throughout been respected, and public worship nearly everywhere celebrated as before.

These affirmations may perhaps astonish many people in this country. I know things have been presented otherwise, and that the French Republic has been accused of the spoliation and persecution of the Churches, especially the Roman Catholic Church. Such a verdict is utterly inaccurate. Those who complain to-day that they do not possess religious freedom in France are only those for whom liberty consists in being able to do themselves all they like without taking any heed of the equal rights of others. Never was there in France as much religious freedom as now. True, there are men, and even political groups, who would gladly avail themselves of the situation to ruin Catholicism and even any kind of religion. But it is false to say that this tendency has prevailed and that there has been any persecution.

To prove this, it is sufficient to recall the facts. The main point, which commands the whole situation, is that the Roman Catholic Church refused to submit to the law voted in Parliament by a very large majority and ratified afterwards by a still larger majority in the general elections.

Whilst all other Churches—Lutheran, Calvinist, Protestant of every denomination, Jewish, &c.—submitted without any recrimination, and immediately set to work at reorganising themselves according to the prescriptions of the new law, the Roman Catholic Church refused to do so, and—still worse—her refusal was according to the Pope's command, although a large majority of the French bishops had given an opposite advice. These, having met on the Pope's invitation in secret council, were in favour of accepting the law, but the Pope, though he declared publicly that he was acting in conformity with their wish, decided that the French Catholics must refuse submission to the law. This is certainly one of the most curious things in modern religious history. And what is still more characteristic is that all the bishops yielded without any protest.

This is the essential cause of all the difficulties amidst which the Roman Catholic Church struggles in France. It should be well understood, indeed, that the situation cannot be the same in an old country like France, where during fourteen centuries the Roman Catholic Church has been united to the State, as it is in the United States of America, where the Churches and the State have from the beginning been entirely separate and distinct the one from the other. Legally, the Church in France, until the day of the separation, fulfilled a public and official function; the churches and temples were state or "commune" properties, wherever they had not been built by a private association consistent with the French law and having expressly reserved its right of property. The bishop did not possess church properties as a private citizen; he ruled them only as head of the bishopric; his diocese was an official subdivision of the country of which he was the governor during his life, and after his death the State appointed a successor after agreement with the Pope. A non-authorised monastic order, such as that of the Jesuits or Dominicans, could not legally possess, since it did not even legally exist.

The aim of the law of separation was not only to suppress the religious budget of the State—that is, to ordain that clergymen should no more be remunerated by the State, but by their flock (that was a very simple matter)—but its chief aim (and a much more difficult one) was to determine under which legal form there could be constituted private societies qualified to enter upon the goods and properties of the parishes and to use the church buildings which belong to the State or the "communes," also with what resources these private societies should be allowed to provide regularly for the maintenance of worship. Anybody whatever could not be authorised to enter into possession of these goods and properties, and it was not possible to allow the ecclesiastics actually in charge to dispose of them according to their own personal convenience.

Thus the law determined they should be delivered to cultural associations (associations culturelles) of a special type. There were to be private societies, consisting of at least seven, fifteen, or twenty-five members, according to the importance of the parish, on condition that they conform themselves to the general conditions of the cult, or worship, whose exercises they proposed to assume. This was to prevent a cultural association from transferring to another worship the goods it claimed.

The members of the Catholic party in Parliament had greatly insisted on this clause, and declared that if it were passed all Catholics would accept the new organisation. Thereupon this condition was granted to them, though it would have been in better conformity with democratic principles to permit the members of each parish to decide for themselves what sort of worship they intended to celebrate in their own church. But the Catholics feared that, if this were done, in many parishes the Roman Catholic Church would be forsaken.

The only other obligation imposed on each of these associations culturelles was that they present every year their budget to the general assembly of its members, as is usual in all private societies. Note here that the association might remain limited to the small number of its founders, a small group renewed by its own choice and which the bishops could have formed in every parish from among their own men, whilst the rest of the flock might yet be admitted as outside members without the right of voting in the assembly. The prescriptions were really not tyrannical. Nevertheless the Pope declared them unacceptable.

Besides, to prepare the transfer of goods, the law decreed an inventory to be drawn up previously in each parish, so as to establish the nature and origin of the properties. Nothing could have been more just and nothing better done to protect churches against spoliation or misappropriation. In all Protestant churches these inventories were drawn up readily. On the contrary, in many places the Catholics assaulted the government's officers who came for the inventory or barricaded themselves in the churches, throwing insults and even filth on the police, and shouting, "We want God," as if God was to be stolen! True, these violences were not provoked by the dignitaries of the churches, but by the leaders of the reactionist political party. But the priests did nothing to prevent these acts of violence and to the mind of the people they bear the responsibility for them.

The refusal to constitute cultural associations was a still more serious matter. Because of it no legal body could receive the properties of the parishes or even make use of the church buildings. This was the most critical moment in the application of the law. Was the government to close the churches, urging that they were escheated properties? This would have greatly satisfied all unreligious fanatics. M. Briand, the minister who had the responsibility of all this business and who had made the report of the law of separation in Parliament, thought, with high wisdom, that he must, above all, assure the freedom of conscience and secure liberty of worship. A new law was passed on Jan. 2, 1907, by which church buildings were left for use to the flocks and to the ministers of worship without any conditions, wheresoever a cultural association had not been formed to claim their use according to the law of separation in 1905. Worship could henceforth be celebrated as previously. But all the church's properties, the archiepiscopal or bishops' palaces, parsonages, seminaries, remained the property of the State or "communes," since no regular society had been constituted to claim them. And the salaries or allowances which, according to the law, the State was to pay to all priests for four years more, were suppressed, since the priests had refused to apply the law. It was but strict justice. By his obstinacy in opposing himself to the judgment of the French bishops the Pope caused the Catholic Church of France to lose all its goods and properties, estimated at about four hundred millions of francs, and deprived the French priests of the allowances the State had bestowed upon them. So this was not a spoliation by the State. It was the Roman Catholic Church itself, which refused to arrange matters, as all other Churches did, so as to enter upon the enjoyment of its properties.

Why did the Pope act thus? Solely in Rome's and the Roman See's interest. He declared the cultural associations to be adverse to the canon law, according to which the churches ought to be governed by the bishops, and not by the congregations. But we have already seen that the share of influence left to the parishioners by the separation law was very small, as so few persons were required to form the cultural associations (seven, fifteen, or twenty-five) and as in most places the bishops could have formed it exclusively out of members of the clergy and people entirely devoted to them. Even that, however, seemed to the Pope a dangerous concession to the democratic spirit. Besides, the priest would have had a certain independence in each parish, and the Pope desired the priest to depend absolutely on the bishop. As he now alone appoints the bishops, these in their turn depend absolutely on him. The result is that the Pope is now the absolute and unique master of the Catholic Church in France. He probably thought this power was worth the four hundred millions, especially as it was not out of his own money that they were paid.

Such is, in fact, for the Roman Catholics the most evident result of the separation. Never was the Catholic Church of France so free in its attitude towards the State as it is now, but also never was it so completely dependent on the Pope. Previously the government appointed the bishops after agreement with the Pope; now the Pope alone appoints them directly, and he chooses the most ultramontane and reactionary ones. Previously the curates were appointed permanently; now they are appointed and removed by the bishops. Previously the financial management of the parish was controlled by the public authorities; now the bishops appointed by the Pope are not accountable to any one for their management, excepting to the Pope.

The financial organisation is not yet definitely settled. Different measures have been taken for the time in the dioceses. Nevertheless, one point is fixed everywhere. In each diocese all the resources are centralised in the hands of the bishop, henceforth as powerful in temporal as in spiritual concerns. For the present the organisation of an inter-diocesan fund is under consideration, which is to divide among the poor parishes the surplus returns of the rich parishes, and this general fund will certainly be placed under the direction of an apostolic legate; that is, a delegate of the Pope.

What the opponents of the separation in France foresaw is about to be realised. The separation will, above all, be profitable to the Roman power. The last remnants of the Gallican liberties (that is, the particular rights belonging to the Churches of France) are vanishing away. To the more and more democratic organisation of the State the Roman Catholic Church opposes a more and more centralised and tyrannical organisation.

We must add that the actual Pope strives with the greatest energy against the liberal spirit which had begun to diffuse itself over the younger clergy in France. A scientific and theological renovation was actually developing in the Catholic publications and Catholic schools under the influence of the Abbé Loisy, Laberthenniere and the Abbé Houtin, whom we have the privilege of seeing amongst us at this Congress, and of many others. Their books are now under interdict, their periodical publications forbidden to the clergy, and all possible measures are taken to keep away from the seminaries their dangerous influence.

The Pope's last Syllabus, recently promulgated, discloses to the whole world the spirit of ignorance and obscurantism prevailing in Rome. The Pope carries to the utmost his intellectual absolutism as well as his ecclesiastical absolutism. The schism between the public mind and the Roman Catholic mind, between Church and School, thus grows worse every day. And it is a serious and sad question how such a situation may be solved.

The masses in France are indifferent to all these matters, but they forsake more and more the Catholic faith. All that the people desire is to attend mass, to be christened, married, and buried at church. They no longer believe the doctrines, but they love the ceremonies. And in proportion as the new generations, educated in the secular lay schools, grow up, this state of mind augments.

Some men of great sense, and amongst them my friend Paul Sabatier, with whose greetings for the Congress I am entrusted, think that a reaction will ensue from the exaggeration of this papal absolutism.

They hope to see men, better instructed as to the true welfare of the church, take in hand a reform of Catholicism. They hope for a real Catholic regeneration, both democratic and scientific, wherein old dogmas shall be left to sleep in peace and all energies shall be consecrated to social and moral work.

Would to God it were so! I must say, I do not believe much in their prophecies. They are generous delusions. In this Neo-Catholic movement there are high-minded individuals, men of great talent and remarkable knowledge. But they are officers without soldiers. And, above all, there is in this new movement a fundamental contradiction which, in the end, must paralyse it. They intend to remain Roman Catholics (that is to say, submitted to the Pope), and they stand up for a cause condemned by the Pope. You will say, A pope does not live for ever: after this one, who is certainly a very narrow-minded man, there may come others with a more open mind, and amongst them one who may take in hand the cause of Catholic reform. There, in my opinion, they are at fault. No pope, even if he were as liberal and well-informed as we may suppose, will ever be willing to work out such a reform, and, even if he were willing, he would not be able to do it. Such a reform would be the beheading of the papacy itself, for the papacy is itself the real impediment for any Catholic reform. The whole history of the Church shows us that ever since the thirteenth century all reforms of the Church proceeded from the people or lower clergy, and that the popes, even when they attempted to be reformers, made the reform turn to the increase of their power. Catholicism may perhaps reform itself, but it can only be from the root, against Rome and not with Rome. The Roman organism may burst asunder from an excess of centralisation, but it is not possible to change it in a secular direction.

The true Catholic ideal is very high, very great, very Christian. In our modern world it can no longer be dogmatic or authoritative. It can be solely moral and religious—a unity of hearts according to the principles of the gospel, amid all the varieties of life. But this ideal is not and cannot be the Roman one. To-day, as formerly, the first condition of spiritual liberty and religious reform is, "No Popery!"

Will the Catholic Church in our Latin countries reform itself from the root? I do not know, and I think nobody can know. At present I foresee no issue to the ecclesiastical and religious situation in France, unless it be great commotions.

France has no inclination for Protestantism. There is no probability that the majority will ever become Protestants. Only a small number of cultivated and deliberate minds adopt that solution. Besides, there is actually not enough real faith in the masses of the people for them to uphold a reform.

Two alternatives seem to me possible. Either the existing reactionist movement of the Catholic Church will go on, and public life in France will for a long time be dominated by the strife between clericals and more or less socialist radicals, or else the Catholic Church of France, conscious of its error, will seek to regain on the social ground the situation it is losing every day more on the religious ground. A Catholic Socialism will grow up, and public life will be dominated by the strife between Catholic Socialism and anti-Catholic Socialism, which in a country like France will necessarily be an unreligious Socialism. In either case the situation will not be favourable to liberalism and liberal religion.

But it is useless to pretend foretelling the times to come. They depend on too many circumstances unknown to us. We must keep faith in the future, and never be weary of enlightening and exalting the minds of our fellows. To-day as well as yesterday, as well as to-morrow, we must be the leaven in the lump. In the French character are admirable reserves of idealism. It cannot find its definitive satisfaction in irreligion and atheism. A renovation of religious idealism appears already in the most gifted of the nation. I do not believe either that France can ever fall a victim to clericalism. It has suffered too much from it in the past to bear its yoke again.

Let us, then, go on forewarning men against this double danger—atheism and clericalism. And the future will disclose ways and means for the religious associations best suited to the spiritual needs.

CONVICTIONS FOR THEFT.

SIR,—Mr. Frank Pearson's first case seems a fair answer to my question about stealing turnips. But it is impossible to re-try a case heard before the magistrates without having all the evidence that was before them, and this full evidence the newspapers never give us. Perhaps my question did not sufficiently convey the real criticism that I wished to make. I was trying to economise space so as to deal with much interesting matter that the book contained. But if this point was worth raising, and I think it was, it deserves fuller consideration. I believe that starving men are very rarely treated harshly by magistrates, and that if severe punishments are inflicted for small thefts, there are other reasons to influence the decision. Believing this, I think it a grievous pity that a lesson intended for Sunday scholars should be so worded as it is in the book under review.

With regard to stealing land, this is impossible except when one comes home with muddy boots. The ways of acquiring a title to land are numerous, complicated, and often objectionable. I have been a supporter of Land Nationalisation for thirty years. But the land-owner who encloses acres of common land believes that the law gives him a right to do this; and is prepared, if necessary, to defend this right in a court of justice. In this defence he may succeed or fail; but, if he fails, he is not condemned as a criminal; and to identify his action with common theft is to confuse the moral issue—again a grievous pity in lessons for Sunday-scholars. There is no need to go to Whitby for illustration. Within two or three miles from my door there has been as much enclosing of common land as anywhere in the country, sometimes in very queer ways. A study of the facts about here would make almost any man believe in land nationalisation, and much more progress towards this would have been made if the end had been pursued with a clearer understanding of the moral issues at stake.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Burnley.—On Thursday and Saturday, Dec. 5 and 7, a sale of work was held in the Trafalgar-street School, for the purpose of reducing the debt on church and schools. It was opened by Mr. Samuel Holden, Mr. Matthew Jobling presiding, and the vote of thanks was moved by the Rev. J. M. Whiteman. Mr. Holden, in his address, strongly endorsed the opinion of Mr. John Burns as to the work of education in advancing the best interests of the people. On Saturday, Mr. John Duerden, of Bury, was the opener, Mr. J. S. Mackie presiding. The total receipts reached £100.

Cairncastle, co. Antrim.—A meeting of the Templepatrick Presbytery was held in the Central Hall, Belfast, on Wednesday, Dec. 4. The Rev. J. A. Miskimmin, of Glenarm, was elected clerk, in succession to the late Rev. Frederic Thomas, and as he has charge of the vacant pulpit at Cairncastle, all communications respecting the same should be addressed to him.

Dukinfield.—A three-days' bazaar, held December 5, 6, 7, in aid of the Old Chapel and and Sunday-school, realised a sum of £1,350.

Edinburgh.—On Monday last Rev. E. T. Russell gave a lecture at St. Mark's Chapel on "Seven Weeks with the Unitarian Van in Scotland," in which he narrated, in a very interesting and vivacious manner, some of his experiences with the inhabitants of the villages and towns visited by the Van in the West of Scotland. The annual social meeting of the congregation was held on Tuesday evening in the Oddfellows Hall. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. R. B. Drummond, who presided, and the Rev. James Forrest. An excellent programme of songs and recitations was gone through, and everyone agreed that a delightful evening had been spent.

Hull.—The centenary of the poet Whittier was brought into prominence at the Park-street Church, on Sunday morning, when the Rev. W. Whitaker emphasised the religiousness of Whittier's songs, which marked him out as the typical poet of the transition from the old faith to the new. In the evening the address was on the Congo question, a large town meeting being held later on the subject. Mr. Whitaker was strongly of opinion that the problem had become much graver since the entrance of the Belgian nation in addition to King Leopold as a determining factor.

London: Essex Church.—A very successful sale of work, organised by the Girl's Club (the senior girls of the Sunday-school and drill class) was held Saturday, Dec. 7, in aid of the children's ward of the Kensington Dispensary. Mrs. Freeston opened the sale, which was well attended by members of the congregation and others, and by the girls' parents and friends. During the afternoon there was a most enjoyable concert, contributed by friends from other congregations. Afternoon teas were daintily served by some of the girls, who acted as waitresses; another delightful feature was a Christmas tree prettily decorated by Mrs. Preston, and laden with toys for children, in place of the usual bran pie. The stalls were erected and the schoolroom decorated by members of the Youths' Club. A sum of just over £20 will be handed to the hospital.

London: Euston Theatre Services.—The special services for the people, conducted by Rev. J. Page Hopps, ended last Sunday evening. He spoke to an exceptionally large audience, from the words: "This one thing I do: I press on." That was his message to them. They should press on to a great united brotherhood, to the ideal of "Peace on earth, good-will amongst men," towards a noble personality. They should press on in a hopeful spirit towards that future life of which he spoke on the previous Sunday.

Manchester: Bradford.—The children's choir of the Mill-street Free Church (ages seven to fourteen) gave an operetta entitled "Princess Ju Ju," in three acts, before an audience of over 300, on Saturday, December 7. The performance, which was in aid of Christmas parties and prize fund, was a great success.

Preston.—A sale of work took place last Saturday, opened by Mr. Smith, of Highfield, Penwortham. Including members' donations, the receipts amounted to over £135.

Richmond.—On Tuesday, December 10, a very successful sale of work was held at Bridge House, in the interest of the Free Church, opened by Mrs. Blake Odgers, who in a happy little speech commented on the excellence of the work which had always been a tradition at Richmond. The proceeds of the sale amounted to £41.

WHAT MEN ARE SAYING.

WHAT MEN ARE DOING.

WHAT MEN ARE THINKING.

SEE A PUBLIC OPINION.

A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.
Every Friday. Twopence.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political, and social progress.

What Mr. R. B. Haldane says of "Public Opinion":—

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion," under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed of men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists, the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.—Yours faithfully,

Percy L. Parker, Esq., Office of "Public Opinion," Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

What Sir Gilbert Parker, M.P., says of "Public Opinion":—

Dear Mr. Parker,—I cannot but congratulate you on that excellent paper, "Public Opinion," which I read regularly. You have a journal of great influence and usefulness.—Yours truly,

GILBERT PARKER.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 30 and 31, Temple House, Tallis-street, London, E.C. Specimens free on application.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ON the eve of Christmas we must for once bid the old year farewell. This last number of THE INQUIRER for 1907 will reach a good many of our friends before Christmas Day is passed, and others when they are already looking towards New Year's Eve. To all alike the most cordial greetings and good wishes!

OUR "Record of the Year 1907" will appear in the New Year's number. In that number also we shall publish an article by the Rev. Joseph Wood, President of the National Conference, which will open the way for that full and frank discussion of the condition of our churches which we have promised. Another New Year's item will be the first of a series of articles by Dr. S. H. Mellone on "What is meant by the Immanence of God." Early in the year we look for a further article by M. Paul Sabatier.

THE Liverpool Free Church Council is about to set on foot an inquiry which should yield an interesting report. According to the Daily News, "They have determined to make a complete survey of the city from a Free Church standpoint. The idea is to find out how far the Free Churches are meeting the modern religious needs of the people. The originator of the scheme is Mr. Arthur Black, a member of the Liverpool City Council, and president of the local Free Church Council. Already an outline plan has been agreed upon by the special committee which will carry on the work. The investigation will deal with such important topics as overlapping, neglected areas, suitability of buildings and services to modern needs, the relation of suburban to town churches, the needs of special classes of the population, the possibilities of united work, religious charities, settlements, institutional churches, &c." The inquiry is to occupy several months, and a special organiser has been appointed for the purpose.

DR. POWICKE, to whose paper on "Theology and the Spiritual Life," delivered at the autumnal session of the Congregational Union, we referred a few weeks ago, has just completed a pastorate of twenty-five years at Hatherlow. As a mark of their regard for him, and of appreciation of his work, the congregation has asked Dr. Powicke to accept a trip to Palestine. At a meeting held to bid him farewell, Dr. Powicke referred to the safeguard he had, both at Hatherlow and in a previous pastorate at Alnwick, in the freedom of utterance which had always been allowed him. With regard to this attitude of the church towards a minister, he said it was the only noble and right one. During the eighteenth century the creed-bound churches had drifted to Unitarianism, while the independent churches remained orthodox. Had either of his congregations compelled him to keep to the old formulas, he might have been driven, as many others had been driven, to Unitarianism. But their patience had saved him from that, for he had found that if they went only a little way below the surface, they became sceptics, but if they went deeply below they became whole-hearted believers. Dr. Powicke's principle is undoubtedly the right one, but his history is at fault. The old congregations in our Connection which became Unitarian were not creed bound.

THE need for housing reform and better sanitation in many country districts is exemplified in an astonishing way by a report of the Local Government Board, recently published, dealing with the rural district of Sherborne, in Dorsetshire. There is plenty of room on the 37,482 acres for the 5,725 people who live there; but two-fifths of the houses used by working people are in a state of chronic dampness, many have no windows or doors at the back and therefore no through ventilation. Most of the ground floors are covered with flagstones, often broken and defective. House drains are not usual; brooks and ditches are contaminated by drainage from middens. Drinking-water is frequently obtained from brooks, ditches, and open pits in the clay soil, which collect surface water from manured fields, and even more dangerous filth impurities.

DAIRY farming is the principal industry of the district, about 6,000 gallons of milk being sent daily to London, Aldershot, &c. The inspector's report of forty-one milk farms visited refers to walls and floors in a filthy condition, and offensive accumulations in badly paved or unpaved yards. It appears not to be the rule for the milkers to wash their hands and cleanse the cows' udders before milking, and there is strong opposition to reform in this and other particulars. Clearly there is need for pressure to be brought to bear from outside on Rural District Councils which do not use their powers to secure sanitary conditions in their areas.

A SCHOOL for young farmers was held at the Ardenconnel centre of the Co-operative Holidays Association during November, modelled on the lines of the High School in Denmark. Both men and women have an opportunity of improving their general education and widening their intellectual outlook, at the same time that they are receiving technical instruction in farming.

DR. CLIFFORD and his co-delegates, who were sent to Buda Pesth by the Baptist World Alliance to arbitrate in a dispute between two Baptist bodies, have returned with a highly hopeful report of their mission. Although there are details yet to be settled, it is understood that the two bodies have agreed to amalgamate, thereby forming one strong Baptist Church independent of the State; for hitherto one body has been under State control and one has not. Dr. Clifford, as chairman of the commission, impressed both parties with his earnestness and geniality. As representing the Baptist World Alliance, seven millions of Baptists were behind him. He conferred with Count Apponyi, the Minister of Public Worship, and Francis Kossuth, Minister of Trade. The Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, secretary of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland, and a member of the commission, referred with obvious pride to the fact that Mr. Lloyd George, a Baptist, occupied in England a Government office which was the counterpart of that occupied in Hungary by Mr. Kossuth.

THE story of the rise and progress of the Baptist Church in Hungary reads like a chapter out of the Acts of the Apostles. In 1872 there were few, if any, Baptists in Hungary, but in that year one Heinrich Meyer, a colporteur in the service of the Scottish Bible Society, became converted to Baptist principles. Immediately he set to work to evangelise Hungary. Having put his hand to the plough, he did not look back, but from day to this he has proclaimed the Baptist faith from city to city and village to village. Everywhere he made and baptized converts, leaving behind the nucleus of a church. To-day there are 16,000 baptized church members in the country. But in 1899, two of his converts, Balogh and Udvarnoki, who had passed through a Baptist college at Hamburg, and had already exercised their ministry six years, formed a new Baptist Union, which broke away from Meyer's party. This new union, which was strongly supported by a Mr. Czopiak, a Government official, applied for and received State recognition. Mr. Czopiak was placed at the head of the church. Government recognition carried with it certain privileges. On the other hand, it involved several disabilities, including incapability to hold land in a corporate capacity, and to educate their children in their own faith. Recognised churches were also liable to special taxation. Restrictions of this kind were odious to Meyer's party as to other Protestant sects. So, for some years the breach between the two Baptist parties had been growing. It was to bring about a reconciliation that the Baptist World Alliance appointed the commission which has just mediated with such happy results. The Union which made terms with the State in 1899 has determined to cut the bond, and now the United Baptist Church of Hungary is likely to go forward in a manner worthy of the splendid apostolic initiation of Heinrich Meyer.

THE Age, Melbourne, reports a somewhat remarkable utterance from the lips of the Chairman of the Congregational Union of South Australia at its annual gathering. Speaking on the subject of Christian union, he is reported to have said: "They had wasted far too much time in fruitless endeavours after union on a theological basis, and it was time they began to seek union on the deepest affections of the heart. Experience had taught them the futility of meeting in conference with representatives of other Churches as if it were their business to find a locus standi on theological statements. The great heart of humanity yearned after a universal church. The great human cry was for 'One body, one spirit, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all.'" This emphatic repudiation of the effort—still proceeding in Australia—to discover a new theological basis of union amongst a certain group of Churches, the Congregational included, is remarkable enough, and its spirit is a welcome surprise from the Chair of a body that has hitherto been as exclusive in its sympathies as any other in the South. Behind it lies the strong feeling of the younger part of the Congregational ministers, but it is to be feared that it will find no response among the laymen of the Church.

ARRANGEMENTS are being made to hold a short series of services at Watford. Will the friends of Liberal Religion in the neighbourhood, who are willing to co-operate, kindly communicate with the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, 1, Valley-road, Stratford Common, S.W.

TRUTH AND THE WAYFARER.

HOWEVER it may have been with men of long ago, the modern pilgrim does not look to find Truth at the bottom of a well! There may be a charm in the thought of her imprisonment there for the purpose of sweetening the waters of life; but those who have seen the flutter of her fair garments in the blowing rain, and under leafy branches, will no longer wish to peer into unsunned depths to find their divinity encircled by damp stones, and locked in icy waters that have never mirrored the sky. It is possible to go further than this, and refuse utterly to conceive of her under the image of a beautiful goddess at all; and, indeed, she has work enough to do in places where the immortals would be sadly in the way. But man, who is a poet at heart, in all times, and in all countries, must yet retain a few symbols, if only to please his fancy occasionally after much study of scientific text-books. And so the radiant presence that once haunted the dreams of the philosophers, typifies for him still the ultimate perfection of knowledge.

In spite of all this, however, when we remember that life itself is only part of a universe in the making, Truth will not appear to us clothed in that majestic mien which one associates with the "most high gods." Rather she will seem as wistful and immature as a northern spring, and this in spite of all our talk about the wisdom of antiquity. For although "the one far-off, divine event" waits to crown her in the distant centuries, as yet she has but gathered a few grains of sand from the trackless shores of the infinite. Creative power is moulding, and immortal destiny is guiding her, as they are moulding and guiding the human race; yet her growth is as slow as that of all most precious things. Glimmerings of "the light that never was on land or sea" have dazzled her from her birth; but she knows as little of their origin as the flower knows of the star, with which it has, nevertheless, some strange, cosmic affinity. Even as man, with his limitations and misgivings, she "follows the Gleam"; and when the great secrets are revealed to her, they will also cease to be enigmas to him.

This view of Truth is, to those who must have fixed creeds and absolute theories, far from exalted; but, to the wayfarer in the wilderness of years, it is singularly soothing. It makes the goddess human and companionable, and gives her a heart that beats as warmly as his own. He can even venture to show her such things as delight him by the wayside—delicate blades of grass, little dewy blossoms, a bird's pencilled feather, jewelled insects, or a leaf from the hedgerow, and she will smile on them all, and give them her own beauty. She, herself, did not make these wonders, but she loves them as soon as she sees them, and, through her sympathy, the wayfarer learns to understand their meaning. No less in crowded cities, at the wharf side, in the noisy markets, passing through smoke-clouded tenements, lingering in hospital wards, hearkening to voices savage with pain and passion, weeping with the little ones who have never been happily mothered, Truth is still the comrade of man; but although she evolves order out of chaos wherever she appears, and seeks to bring sweetness and light into all the dark places of earth, she pays the penalty of youth in many an apparent failure when she would accomplish her tasks too quickly. Truth is still inexperienced; but how can it be otherwise? Knowledge is attained with heart-breaking slowness, and the world has been bound by error so long!

The goddess men used to worship looked coldly down on those who slew each other for her sake. She was not only above them, but she scorned their human needs; and, to the critical philosopher, it seemed immaterial whether you died for one opinion or another. All were equally false, and he was the wisest man who put no faith in any. But Truth to-day has her part and lot in every hope of man, even in his halting theologies! She steals into the cathedral and conventicle alike, catching a word of wisdom, now from the lips of the ecclesiastic, and now from the hoarse utterance of the fanatic. She puts on no Olympian airs, and mixes as freely with socialists as with scholars. The fervour of enthusiasts makes her own bosom glow, and the patient labours of men of science teach her to be humble. Our poets, indeed, will have to rhyme about her in a new fashion, for she now has a place in the lowest ranks of life; and the majestic adjectives which formerly used to figure in odes to her imperious beauty, have ceased to be appropriate. Truth is verily with, and of, man—bone of his bone, flesh of his flesh; and she grows as he advances, if she grows at all. She herself does not realise, even yet, what glory is to be hers—still less, what anguish she has to undergo, and what martyrs she must inspire. Neither does she remember too sorrowfully the trouble of her birth, any more than the spring remembers how passionately she wrought to break from the bonds of winter. The free air is all about her, one "a little lower than the angels" holds her by the hand; and the curiosity of youth, mingled with an underlying gravity which only the thinker understands, give to her face its almost fantastic loveliness.

Truth is the child of God who will one day know the mind of her Father. Like the woodland blossom, she had her beginnings in a dark underworld given over to the dominion of creeping, eyeless things that abhor the sun. But even as that perfect piece of life pricks through the sod, and gives to the light, in colour and fragrance, all that it has gathered for the service of beauty in the damp, brown mould, so this consummate flower of humanity will render up, at last, the loveliness born of her sojourning on earth. And, in that day, man too will pass beyond the bourne of time and space, and know the things whereof, at present, he only dimly dreams.

LAURA ACKROYD.

INSENSATE things, such as rocks and seas of water, do not grow. Animals and trees grow a little, for a little time, and come to their limit. But the grandest attribute of our created minds, one that belongs to no other finite creature whatever, is that they have the gift of a growth everlasting. —Horace Bushnell.

MANUAL ON THE EARLY CHURCH.*

MR. THOMAS'S book is a valuable addition to the series of manuals issued by the Sunday School Association, under the general supervision of Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter. Its scope is limited, as its title indicates. Mr. Addis's manual, in the same series, "Christianity and the Roman Empire," dealt admirably with the external relations of the Church. Mr. Thomas deals with its internal development, especially in the matter of organisation, clergy, and ritual institutions, touching only incidentally the evolution of Christian doctrine. When shall we have an equally good little book on this subject? The manual before us is thoroughly good; firm in outline, well reasoned, and rich in illustrative quotations. The reader may dissent from two or three of Mr. Thomas's conclusions, but will readily admit that it is not very easy to upset them. He will admit also that the undertaking is not an easy one—that of driving a clear line through a mass of historical evidence which has been complicated by controversy, ancient and modern. Mr. Thomas's success is in no small degree due to the fact that he holds no brief, and has not to make a case for any church or party; he is a trained student of history, and he states what he finds.

To summarise the contents of the book by a mere recital of chapter headings would be to make it look dry and conventional; but still, it is well to state concisely what may be found in it. After a vivid sketch of the Church of the first century, our author treats of the ministry of "spiritual gifts," and its revival in Montanism: the effect of controversy with Gnosticism, and especially with the ultra-Pauline eclecticism of Marcion, in the formation of the canon and the Rule of Faith: the drawing inward of the Church and the stiffening of its organisation in the clergy, and especially the episcopate. Then follow chapters on Baptism and the Lord's Supper; and on the effect upon the Church of its State-establishment. A brief summary of early Christian literature closes the volume.

It is not easy to make "elegant extracts" from a very business-like book, as this is. Perhaps the following lines, from the section headed "The Rise of Theology," furnish as good a specimen as could be found of Mr. Thomas's treatment of the more general topics connected with the early history of Christianity. The immediate reference is to the language of Peter in Acts ii. 22-24:—

"It may be observed that here, as throughout the Book of the Acts, where an audience of Jews is addressed, Jewish words and conceptions are employed. Traffic of thought could only take place by a coinage of words and ideas, common to friend and foe alike, and the only treasury from which the disciples could draw proofs to show that Jesus was the Messiah was the national history and literature. Accordingly the Christians, in the course of making plain their beliefs, were silently absorbing new elements foreign and often inferior to their original message. This process is evident through all the three centuries which preceded the Council of Nicæa. While belief is struggling to find definite forms, it is also gathering accretions from its surroundings, and each new dogma adds something to the last. The Christianity which gains converts in the pagan world receives a strong infusion of pagan ideas. Teachers attempt to meet the Gnostics on their own ground and a Gnostic deposit is left. The faith finds itself compelled to deal with the philosophy and metaphysics of Greece and Rome, with the result that it becomes a philosophy and presents a metaphysical doctrine of the Godhead. This process went on none the less surely because of intense opposition. In the Dialogue of Justin with the Jew Trypho, Justin proceeds little by little to capture the whole of Jewish history and prophecy as a logical setting for his idea of Jesus, in order to convince his opponent"—(pp. 71, 72).

Probably it is in the chapters on Baptism and the Lord's Supper that the reader will find the information and the opinions which will strike him as most novel, especially with regard to the influence of paganism on these rites of the Church. Of the strange new life that sprang up in pagan religion during early Christian times, chiefly in connection with cults imported from Egypt and the East, Mr. Thomas says:—

"During the first century, when Christianity was winning its way, there was a great religious revival in paganism. The Eleusinian mysteries which had been losing hold of popular favour again attracted large numbers of devout persons throughout the empire. It was then that the new note of morality was heard in their ritual. Numerous forms of worship were imported from the east, and were eagerly accepted, because they promised deliverance from the bondage of sin, regeneration, salvation, and the liberty of true service. On the threshold of a chapel in Africa were the striking words, 'Enter good, go forth better.' The worship of Isis spread all through the empire, and her believers were enrolled in her ranks as a sacred soldiery. 'Give thy name,' said the priest to the candidate for initiation, 'to this holy worship; and dedicate thyself to the observance of our religion, take on thee the freewill yoke of service, for when thou beginnest to serve the goddess thou shalt feel the fruit of thy liberty.' Isis was but one of her names. She was the principle of unity ruling the earth, and all other deities were but manifestations of her power. When the worship of Isis entered a new town, a coalescence took place with the gods previously worshipped there. It was dimly felt that all the other deities were but names and aspects of the one central reality. The person who was initiated into her cult was, in the emphatic words of Apuleius, renatus, 'born again'; he was led by the goddess into 'the paths of a new salvation.'"

When Mr. Thomas proceeds to speak of the influence of the mysteries upon the rites of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, we do not go all the way with him. He agrees with Wernle in seeing a magical and prophylactic significance in baptism into a name. If we translate James ii. 7, as "the noble name which was invoked upon you," i.e., the name of Christ, and admit, further, that there is ample evidence in the Book of Acts of the persistence in Christianity of the Jewish beliefs in the magic of names, we should still be disinclined to admit that the element of magic, or of exorcism, was predominant in primitive Christian baptism. Of course, it is obvious that the Gentile convert of the second and third centuries frequently brought into Christianity the language of mysteries with which he was familiar. It is practically certain that Clement of Alexandria had been a pagan initiate. While, on his intellectual side, he is ready to vindicate Christianity as the true Gnosis, on his mystical side he extols it as the true mystery, and transfers to it the rhapsodies about illumination and epopteia which he had learnt elsewhere.

"O truly sacred mysteries! O stainless light! My way is lighted with torches and I survey the heavens and God. I am become truly holy while I am initiated. The Lord is the hierophant and seals while illuminating him who is initiated."

One must not press the evidence of particular cases too far. There are many indications, however, that the less educated Christian who lived among devotees of various cults was wont to boast that his religion was as mysterious as any, and to take pride, not in the simplicity of his faith, but in the occult symbolism in which he could wrap it up. Towards the end of the second century, Avircius of Hieropolis writes his epitaph, which tells how he, a disciple of the pure shepherd, went to Rome to see the golden-robed, golden-slippered queen; and there he saw a people bearing the splendid seal; and everywhere faith led the way, and fed him with the fish from the fountain, mighty and stainless, whom a pure virgin grasped, giving the mixed cup with bread. Here we have the Church and its rites symbolised in a way that was destined to be lasting and influential. And just while this good man may have been in Rome, three highly educated lawyers were sitting on a breakwater by the mouth of the Tiber, and joining in that remarkable conversation which is preserved to us by Minucius Felix; wherein a Christian converts a pagan by proving to him that Christianity is a theistic philosophy of a very cosmical type, combined with a high morality and a commonsense that cares nothing for forms and symbols. It was because Christianity had its word for all, and became, in a sense, all things to all men, that it is difficult in reviewing its history to avoid throwing into prominence the elements we find most congenial, and neglecting others which we may find trivial or embarrassing.

OUR CITY OF GOD.*

ST. AUGUSTINE wrote his great work "Concerning the City of God," at a time when Rome, the City of the World, had been sacked by the Goths, and it was his design to contrast these two cities as to their origin, progress, and destinies. The war of good and evil goes on as of old, and possibly we of the twentieth century are more alive to the fact of the struggle in every department of life and every country of the world than were the best of the ancients. It is for this very reason we cannot accept Augustine's definiteness of boundaries between the two, and still less the appalling superiority in power and in numbers, which he allows the "the City of the Devil," until the end comes. So we need new conceptions of both cities and their increasing warfare and its final outcome, and Mr. Brierley has done well to offer to the world his conception under the title, "Our City of God."

He begins "with some chapters of definite theological statement," wisely enough, it seems to us, for however we may protest against dogmatism, it remains true that every thoughtful person must have his convictions on these grave matters, God, Christ, Sin, Salvation, and the like. And as is well written, "It is not by calling each other names, but by getting at facts and the right deductions from them, that we may have to reach any sure ground or any clear light on these high matters." And Mr. Brierley's conclusions, while acceptable to many even of those who call themselves or are called by others Unitarians, will offend none. We can quote but one sentence out of many pages full of large suggestiveness. It is that which concludes the chapter on "The Incarnation":—

"We do not, in the spiritual evolution, know where man ends and God begins. But as we study Jesus in his life and death, and in the power of his resurrection, what we do know is that here God and man are manifestly one."

The second part of the work is social. We are but just beginning to realise how "The Church by its neglect of the social problem has lost much of its position as a leader and guide of humanity." Hitherto, Christians have, as a rule, concerned themselves first with "saving souls," and then with the deliverance of men from ill-health and unhealthy conditions, from destitution and misery, from injustice and wrong, dealing with them only as individuals or families. The problem has been how A or B may be relieved, the far more difficult but not insoluble one, how "the lower classes"—the classes below the level of decent human life—may be uplifted, is only beginning to occupy our attention. Yet to those who believe that what they daily pray for is possible to be, and that they have to work for it, who believe that God's kingdom is to come and is coming, and the Heavenly Jerusalem to be established in our midst, sweating and slums and the like are our sins and not merely our misfortunes, and as such concern us as religious men.

But all religion is of the heart, the kingdom of God must be within before it can be manifested without. And so the third part of this treatise is personal. It strikes us as not quite so complete as is the first part and even the second. Many excellent topics are excellently treated, such as "Friendship," "Being Ill," "Old and New," but one has a suspicion that they have been selected out of Mr. Brierley's well-filled pigeon-holes rather than written for this work.

We should like to see the first part printed separately with the motto, "What we want is not so much a New Theology as a True Theology." We thank Mr. Brierley for this simple but pregnant saying.

FROM THE INDIAN POINT OF VIEW.*

THE name of Sivanáth Sástri is known to those of our readers who keep in touch with Brahma Samaj matters, and such readers will not need to be told that he is a leader held in high honour. We have it, however, on the authority of Sir Roper Lethbridge, that he is "one of the most distinguished writers of modern Bengal." Sir Roper says:—

"It is also reasonable to expect that the biography of Ramtanu, covering such an eventful period in the social, moral, and religious history of Bengal, would introduce to the reader a large number of interesting and varied characters and scenes grouped around the central personage. The Pandit's work is quite the most scholarly book of its kind, as well as the most serious and sustained effort to combine in a biographical work, Oriental and Western modes of thought, that has yet appeared in Bengali."

Coming with such testimony in its favour the volume before us is assured of a welcome. But it very soon speaks for itself, and in such a gentle and original way that despite the unfamiliar names (or spelling of names known in another form), it leads us on, with ever-growing interest, only to regret the whole is so brief. The book is furnished with many portraits, and is generally handsome in appearance. It certainly ought to be widely read, not only on account of the worth and work of the good man whose career it narrates, but we had almost said chiefly because of the light it affords on Indian modes of life and thought.

Ramtanu Lahiri's life extended from 1813 to 1898, and it was spent in the midst of that intellectual, social, and religious advance which is fitly described as "the Renaissance in Bengal." Sir Roper Lethbridge, as editor, has with wise insight into the attractive merits of the original work confined his own remarks chiefly to a short introduction. In this he speaks of Lahiri as long ago marked out by his "saintly life and lofty patriotism" "as a leader of men in the cultured Bengali society of Calcutta and Krishnagar." Coming into public prominence after Rammohan Roy, and before Keshava Chandra Sen (known to English people generally as Keshub Chunder Sen), and being himself of a gentle, unassuming temperament, he never attained a celebrity equal to theirs; but the editor is "inclined to think that his influence, in bringing out all that was best in the minds and hearts of the young Bengal of his day was not inferior to theirs." As valiant as any reformer in standing up for the good and true in national life, he was so essentially a gentleman "that he conserved while he reformed and was critical without being abusive."

Though by birth a Kulin of very high descent, a Brahman of the Brahmans, Lahiri was in childhood subjected to extreme poverty. A piteous spectacle is given of the kind of "education" he underwent at the village patshala, an institution that would vie apparently with that of Mr. Squeers. Then he caught a glimpse of higher possibilities in the school set up by Mr. David Hare, one of the least missionary-like missionaries of the West to the East, a man, indeed, outside "religion," as judged by some, but filled with a wise and benevolent spirit that made his work one of the greatest of levers in uplifting Indian life. Day after day the wretched lad ran beside Mr. Hare's conveyance begging to be admitted as a free scholar. His persistence was at last rewarded, and he came under the influence of a Eurasian, Derozio, whose name ought to be celebrated, though probably it will be as unfamiliar to most as to the present writer till this book reached him. Some day, when the great India of the future has rooted itself firmly and flourished as it surely will, the name of this splendid young teacher will be enshrined among the dearest traditions of his country's new-birth. He was influential not only in eliciting intellectual effort, but also in exciting high moral ambitions, and through his pupil Lahiri these influences spread to many a life. For Ramtanu Lahiri was, in his turn, only a teacher, but he was such a teacher as to be known far and wide as "the Arnold of Bengal." Of his patience, industry, self-denial, buoyant hope, and quiet determination these pages are eloquent. In religion he found himself, of course, in close sympathy with the reformers of Hinduism; he broke caste, though it cost him dear, and in other ways he showed the true martyr-spirit. But he was never an extreme man, and, as far as consisted with honesty, he would minimise rather than magnify the difference between himself and his orthodox Hindu friends.

Enough has been said to assure the reader that it is no ordinary man whose life is here described—would that space permitted an adequate presentation of the style of the book. It is deliciously quaint at times, and always delightfully sincere. The follies of the "reformers," as well as their virtues are depicted; and one folly specially calls for remark. In order to show how thoroughly they were breaking with the old order the young zealots would drink intoxicants, even to drunkenness. If the representatives of the old order received no better proof of Western excellences than this, we need not wonder that they declined the proffered "advance." But here, as mostly, good and evil were mixed. The book helps us to understand the social and political problem of India better than we did, and to wonder anew at the many lovable men there are in the world far beyond our knowing. The long roll of men eminent in one way or another that we find here shows also how extremely various the Indian types of character are, and how absurdly erroneous is the average Briton's notion about his fellow-subjects in the great Empire. We gather comfort from these pages as we see the abounding evidence of statesmanly action on the part of our representatives in the East. So much has been alleged of late by fanatics against the Governors of India that it is good to observe the whole-hearted tributes given to their wise efficiency by a native writer of such indubitable authority and discrimination as Pandit Sástri.

SIR ROWLAND HILL.*

It is twenty-eight years since Sir Rowland Hill died, and though Dr. Birkbeck Hill's "Life" of his uncle remains a standard book, Mrs. Smyth has done well to tell her father's story for readers of to-day, especially in its relation to the "Great Reform" which we owe to him. The introductory chapter has many interesting things about the different lines of descent which met in Rowland Hill. A Sir Rowland was Lord Mayor of London in 1549, and from his brother were descended the three Rowland Hills famous in more modern times. Thomas Wright Hill, the postal reformer's father, brought up in a very narrow religious circle, became a devoted disciple of Priestley in Birmingham. When the Birmingham rioters stopped the carriage in which the future Mrs. Hill was driving, and bade her cry, "Church and King," she refused, but was suffered to pass on unmolested. No wonder that the children of this couple were "born to a burning hatred of tyranny."

The chapters on "The Old Postal System" and "Some Early Postal Reformers" give amazing information as to long-continued injustice of making the middle and poorer classes pay exorbitant rates for postage, while the franked correspondence—sometimes immense in quantity for those days—of members of both Houses of Parliament and of their friends and hangers on went free. Correspondence between separated members of poor families was out of the question. "The duty on newspapers was an odious 'tax on knowledge,' and rendered a cheap press impossible," and all kinds of complicated and restrictive regulations were added to the heavy cost. Meanwhile, the revenue from the Post Office remained stationary. When Rowland Hill came to study the history of the Post Office he found that some early reformers had been very scurvily treated—an experience in which he was to share later on. His two principles, which, with indomitable perseverance, he pressed upon those in authority, and finally with success, were uniformity of rate, irrespective of distance, and prepayment, by a device of his own, "a bit of paper just large enough to bear the stamp"—i.e., the dated cancelling mark of the Post Office—"and covered at the back with a glutinous wash, which, by applying a little moisture, might be attached to the letter."

How hard Rowland Hill toiled to secure his reforms, how much he was hampered and worried by adherents of the old system, when an official position gave him the opportunity of carrying out the details of his scheme, may be read—and it is often sad reading—in his daughter's pages. But his patience never failed, even with men who had pronounced his scheme "revolutionary, preposterous, wild, visionary, absurd, clumsy, and unpracticable." His brother, Matthew Davenport Hill, said, wittily, "I hold in great awe prophets who may have the means of assisting the fulfilment of their own predictions."

The book is a worthy tribute to a man of fine character who rendered incalculable service to his fellows.

SHORT NOTICES.

Apologia: An Explanation and Defence, by Edwin A. Abbott, author of "Silanus the Christian," is not the volume of Notes promised in the preface to that work of historical imagination, in defence of the positions there assumed. Dr. Abbott's work has grown upon his hands. His notes on "Silanus" proved, as they came into being, to be rather "Notes on New Testament Criticism," and as such are to form the next volume of his "Diatessarica." The present work is rather a reply to certain critics of "Silanus" and a further elucidation of the author's position, as one who disbelieves in the miraculous, but more and more strongly holds to faith in the supernatural, and believes Christ to be divine, and, as the incarnate Son of God, a just object of worship, with the Father and the Holy Spirit. The last chapter contains a most interesting summary of the contents and the whole scope of the several volumes of Dr. Abbott's "Diatessarica," of which the seventh and eighth parts, the Notes above referred to, and the volume on "The Fourfold Gospel" have still to be published. (A. & C. Black. 2s. 6d. net.)

We are very glad to receive a second edition of Professor Gardner's Exploratio Evangelica, a Survey of the Foundations of Christianity, originally published in the autumn of 1899. We have since had the Jowett Lectures for 1901 on "A Historic View of the New Testament," and this year the lectures on "The Growth of Christianity," from the same accomplished author, and to this second edition of his chief work Dr. Gardner adds a new preface, in reply to critics, chiefly on the subject of miracles. The book, he says in conclusion, is not critical alone, but aims at reconstruction. "To the writer this side of his work has been infinitely the more interesting, and it is only for the sake of this that he has undergone the long drudgery of critical investigation. It is on this more positive aspect of Christianity that he has dwelt in more recent works, and to it he hopes to devote such opportunities as may fall to him in the future." (A. & C. Black. 5s. net.)

The Religion of a Heretic, by David F. Stewart, M.A., is an excellent little book. At times it crackles with liveliness, and surely the author must enjoy his own singularity. There is as curious an assortment of beliefs set forth as one shall meet on a summer's day. Jesus, in our author's opinion, was "God's own Son, living in heaven with Him, partaking of His nature, and no doubt sharing with Him the government of the world. He comes to earth, begins life as a child, develops gradually, advances in wisdom, and finally becomes a man." Yet it is not only insisted that Jesus made mistakes, it is not only hinted that Christ's own mistakes must be reckoned among the causes of the crucifixion, it is laid down that he undoubtedly sinned. Yet Christ is described as a Saviour; a very real work of Atonement is ascribed to Him; he is set forth as One (always the word for Christ has a capital letter), who stands between God and man. From any definite basis of New Testament criticism the book is as free as Seeley's "Ecce Homo." It is hardly right, perhaps, to name it in close connection with that great work. Yet, like that stimulating and inspiring essay, it has a delightful freshness and breeziness most helpful to the tired and baffled seeker for truth. Hardly anyone will read the book without discovering inconsistencies; many will be astonished at the amazing assurance with which very questionable statements are made, but no one need question the genuine sincerity of the author. Many will be glad to have one more example of the impression made by a study of the Gospels upon a frank and fearless mind. (Open Road Publishing Company. 1s. net; in cloth, 2s.)

Thoughts for Life's Journey, by George Matheson, D.D., will be welcomed by those who derived inspiration and comfort from the sermonettes which the late Dr. Matheson contributed to the Christian World. This book will console many a weary soul. Especially comforting is the meditation on "Rejuvenescence." "We speak of the burdens of age; and it has burdens. But say as you will, there are burdens which age removes, and these the heaviest ones. Care presses most upon the morning just because it is the morning. I am more troubled by shadows in hope than by shadows in memory. Earth is uncertain in my early hours; and uncertainty is unfavourable to song. But in life's evening I can sing." (Jas. Clarke & Co. 3s. 6d. net; in leather, 5s. net.)

The Light Eternal is a story worth reading. The author, Peter Rosegger, is a Catholic of serious mind, deep sympathy with the people, and no little skill as a word-painter. In a former volume, A Prisoner's Story of the Cross (Hodder & Stoughton), he set forth one more popular presentation of the life and death of Jesus, in which, while his history, geography and local colour are glaringly defective, and the gospel materials are used with startling freedom, there is, nevertheless, a great deal that is deeply suggestive. It is not a Protestant "Life of Christ," still less a critic's, but there must be thousands of Catholics, and some rationalists, who would get good out of it. The new work tells of the life of a little German Alpine village, of its religious and irreligious types as discovered and depicted by the simple and earnest parish priest, and of the social problems involved in the conversion of rural districts into urban. Evidently the author sides with those who would modernise the Church, while, as evidently, he feels the value of the old pieties and symbolisms. He is a writer to know. (T. Fisher Unwin. Price 6s.)

New (?) Theology is the title of a volume of twenty-four sermons by Archdeacon Wilberforce, "Thoughts on the Universality and Continuity of the Doctrine of the Immanence of God." They are sermons preached in the ordinary course of his ministry, to meet an expressed need for information as to the so-called "New Theology." "Not new at all" is the Archdeacon's general answer. His own doctrinal position is well known. Thus he says once more in the preface: "It was the mission of Christ to restore, to illuminate, and to manifest in His own Person the ancient Theology of the Immanence of God; to convince man that humanity is an expression of the Universal Father-Soul; to appeal to man 'above himself to lift himself' because he belongs to God; to assure man that he is immortal because God is immortal, and that he has within him a life which is Divine; that of that Divine life, which is the attribute of humanity as a whole, He, the Lord Jesus, was the absolutely perfect embodiment for purposes of observation; that as this Immanence of God in man is recognised, acknowledged, obeyed, it will regenerate man's nature, control his lower conditions, emancipate him from the tyranny of the senses, and finally conform him to the image of the Perfect Son." (Elliot Stock. 5s.)

The True Theology, by J. T. Freeth, is an examination of the "New Theology" by a representative of the New Church, in the teaching of which (following Swedenborg) "the Lord Jesus is alone worshipped as God." The position is thus completely antagonistic to Mr. Campbell's "Jesus was God, but so are we." "To think of man as a 'potential Christ,'" says Mr. Freeth, "is dishonouring and belittling to our conceptions of Him." Yet the teaching of his own Church is "We must think of God as always human." There is no "potential" Christ. There is and always was only one Christ, and He is God. It is an interesting study. (H. R. Allenson. 1s. 6d. net.)

It will scarcely be felt that the pamphlet New Theology Problems, by the Rev. R. R. Rodgers, contributes anything to the subject. The tone is very dogmatic, and there is no attempt to understand the inner motives and spirit of Mr. Campbell's teachings. The writer is a Swedenborgian, and he makes clear the difference between the "New Church" doctrines and the New Theology. On the subject of the Inspiration of the Bible, he agrees that there are many literal inaccuracies, but holds that "they are there purposely," the Scriptures being in every verse a divine revelation and not the work of man; but the inner spiritual truth has to be elicited by means of the 'science of correspondences.'" (F. Warne. 6d. net.)

Professor J. C. Bose, of the Presidency College, Calcutta, is known to our readers as a distinguished scientist. His remarkable work on "Response in the Living and Non-living" was reviewed in these columns (Aug. 1, 1903), and more recently his "Plant Response as a means of Physiological Investigation." Now we have a further exhaustive work from his pen, Comparative Electro-Physiology, which, like its predecessors, is amply illustrated. The work is highly technical, and appeals to the scientific expert. We can offer here only a word of respectful welcome. (Longmans. 15s. net.)

A new and cheaper edition of the symposium on The Atonement in Modern Religious Thought, which appeared originally in The Christian World, 1899-1900, is a timely publication. Harnack and Sabatier, Lyman Abbott and T. T. Munger, Farrar and Fremantle, R. J. Campbell, Marcus Dodds, Forsyth, Horton, and Hunter are among the contributors. (Jas. Clarke & Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

A Literary History of the Arabs, by R. A. Nicholson, M.A., Lecturer in Persian at Cambridge, is added to the series which includes R. W. Fraser's Literary History of India, and Barrett Wendell's similar work on America. We find here history and legends of the Pagan Arabs, and a chapter on Pre-Islamic Poetry, Manners, and Religion. Then we come to the great Prophet of Islam and the Koran, and later developments. The chapter on Orthodoxy, Free-Thought, and Mysticism should prove specially attractive. The concluding chapters deal with the Arabs in Europe, and the period from the Mongol Invasion to the present day. (T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

Mr. S. H. Eachus has revised and brought up to date a children's play which he wrote originally in 1889, Britannia's Court of Friendship and Goodwill, which he designates "A Patriotic Pageant." Japan in "kimono," &c., and Africa in "khaki breeches," &c., are among the symbolic representatives who come to the reception at Britannia's Court. (Wolverhampton: Whitehead Bros. TEMPERANCE LEGISLATION.

SIR,—I am invited by the Committee of the National Unitarian Temperance Association to direct the serious attention of your readers to the importance of the forthcoming Licensing Legislation.

The Government has given the strongest assurances that a comprehensive Licensing Bill will be the very first measure brought before the House of Commons next session.

The question is therefore pressing, and must be dealt with not merely by the organised Temperance Societies, but by everyone who is interested in the moral and social welfare of the people.

We have the right to expect, from the utterances of His Majesty's Ministers, that the Government will bring in a Bill which will include local option for England and Wales, national Sunday closing, and the exclusion of children from licensed houses, as well as those reforms in the machinery of licensing upon which there is common agreement amongst temperance reformers.

Such a measure of licensing reform would, I believe, have a direct and far-reaching effect upon the lack of employment, the bad housing of the poor, the high rate of infant mortality, and many other social problems which occupy the minds of all good citizens.

I hope that those who are convinced of the great necessity for temperance reform will do everything in their power to make their influence felt, and will not fail to express their support of the Government

Bill, provided always that it will place the power of controlling the liquor traffic in the hands of the people.

OBITUARY.

MR. SAMUEL HALL.

THE congregation of Unity Church, Islington, has suffered a great loss in the death, on December 9, of Mr. Samuel Hall, F.I.C., F.C.S., Treasurer of the Society of Chemical Industry. Mr. Hall was an earnest student of the Old Testament, and at the time of Colenso's first critical study of the Creation records his thought had been running on the same lines, and an interesting correspondence ensued between him and the Bishop. Last January Mr. Hall lectured on "The Book of Isaiah" at one of the Literary Society's meetings, when he was heartily congratulated on the undimmed vigour of his Biblical research. He was a man of generous sympathies, and was held in high regard by his fellow-members at Unity Church and by a wide circle of friends. The funeral service was conducted on December 12 at Golder's Green Crematorium, by the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, who also conducted a memorial service at Unity Church on the following Sunday.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"And Jesus advanced in wisdom, and stature, and in favour with God and man."—Luke ii. 40. THIS is the last Children's Column in 1907. Before another appears, 1908 will have begun. We know that a new year really begins every day, and that each to-day we ought to try to be and do better than yesterday, and look forward to a still better to-morrow, but it is well to feel specially sorry for past failures, and make special resolutions for the future on the days which are fixed to be called the last of the Old Year and the first of the New Year. We know that people should wish each other well at all times, but it is good to make sure of greeting everyone at least once a twelvemonth with best wishes for "A Happy New Year!"

It is fortunate that January 1 follows so close on Christmas Day, when Christmas is a fresh and happy memory, for our New Year wishes should mean much what our Christmas ones do. If we have kept Christmas well, we have all, even among the merry-making, resolved to help each other to be, as far as we know how, more Christ-like in character. God sent the baby Jesus to grow up and show us how every day and every year from childhood onwards, we can share in making that perfect, happy life for everyone for which God made the world, and for which we pray to Him, "Thy Kingdom come, Thy Will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

Perhaps someone will show you pictures and a map, and help you to pick out verses in the Gospels, while I tell you something about Jesus' childhood, in the hope of helping you to understand this growing to be Christ-like in character.

You know that Jesus' home was in Nazareth, a quiet town, climbing up a steep hill-slope at the end of a narrow valley in Galilee. It was from Nazareth he went with his parents by caravan to Jerusalem to the great Jewish Feast of the Passover, when he slipped away to talk with the learned men in the Temple. Then when his parents found him, "he went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and he was subject unto them."

His father, Joseph, the village carpenter, would be, as all Galileans were, rough in speech, sturdy, energetic and warm-hearted, like our North Country folk. Very little is told about him, but he must have been a father worthy to love and obey. Jesus would not have always thought of God as a Heavenly Father if his earthly one had not been especially upright, just, and loving. And his mother? There is an old Jewish saying, "God could not be everywhere, and so He made mothers." Mary must have been such a good and tender mother as to be a never-failing help in difficulty and comfort in sorrow.

It was a poor home, and all had to do something to keep it. Jesus, as eldest of five brothers and two sisters, would be his mother's chief help with the other children, and with the home jobs, such as gathering sticks and fetching water, to save her time in her baking, spinning, weaving, and clothes-making. He also, like most Jewish boys, worked at his father's trade. There is a wonder-story that he pulled the boards out longer if Joseph cut them too short. Perhaps the person who made it up meant that Jesus was very conscientious. Often when Jesus was a man he showed how wrong it was towards God and other people to be forgetful of duty, or unfaithful in the smallest bit of work. Jesus learnt to read at the minister's school (called a "vineyard," because the children sat in rows on the ground like vines), but most of his lessons were at home, the lessons of cheerful duty, of self-help, and helping others, of patience, perseverance, courage, and endurance.

Did Jesus never play? Oh yes. He would not in after life have been so fond of watching children's games, if he had not remembered his own play on the flat house-top, or the street, and market place. There are stories that he made fish-ponds, and shaped animals out of clay, and that when they played a game something like our May Queen, they chose Jesus king, and crowned him with flowers. What sort of a boy would you choose for king in a game?

Then you can pick out many verses in the Gospels to show how he must from his childhood have enjoyed God's beautiful country, rambling among the cornfields, orchards, vineyards, olive-gardens, and pastures, and watching the farmers or shepherds at work, and how he loved the flowers, birds and animals, with which God blessed Galilee so abundantly.

"And Jesus advanced in wisdom, and stature, and in favour with God and man." A short sentence, but think how much it means. He was a Jewish child, wearing a striped tunic, living in an Eastern home very different from yours, but like every boy and girl, whose childhood is well-spent, he grew to good purpose in body, mind, and soul with the help of God and good people. He outgrew his clothes as you do, and became strong and active. He outgrew his bad habits and little faults of disobedience, ill-temper, pride, and selfishness as you can yours, if you try as hard as he did. He outgrew much that was taught and practised in the name of serving God among the Jews, but all that was pure and noble in the regular worship at home, and at the synagogue, and in his parents' teaching and example sank into his heart. He revered the Hebrew patriarchs and prophets, and Moses, the Jewish saviour and lawgiver, about whom you learn in the Old Testament, and he learnt to look forward to the coming of a great king called "Messiah" to reign with perfect righteousness. He was taught that God must be served with a pure heart and clean life, and, therefore, knew that His still small voice of conscience must be obeyed by everyone unfailingly before there could be a reign of perfect righteousness either in heaven or on earth. He felt above all things that God is Love, and that we best deserve God's love by loving Him and other people better than ourselves. No wonder then that Jesus was a good son and brother at home, and a good playmate among the village lads, that he was known among the neighbours for a pleasant-spoken, companionable boy, always ready when possible, to lend a helping hand, especially where most needed. So God blessed him for a child who was already, as far as he knew how, doing God's Will on earth as it is done in heaven, and who would in fulness of time grow to the measure of the stature of the perfect man.

May your childhood each year grow more Christlike, and may God bless you every day in your different homes and schools with the happiness of a good conscience and a loving heart in all your work and play! Then you will be ready with different gifts and opportunities, but with equally valuable service, and the same Christlike spirit, to live or die, as God wills, and you will help to bring the time nearer when every child, or man and woman may like Jesus share a perfect life with God on earth and in heaven.

ERRATUM.—In last week's "Children's Column," at the beginning of the Millais article, for "sixty" read "seventy."

An attempt is being made to establish collegiate halls for students of the London University. More House, in Cheyne-walk, Chelsea, has been opened to accommodate nine students, and will soon provide for seven others. It is intended as the first house of a great University Hall. It stands on the site of Sir Thomas More's garden. London University has 3,300 internal students, about as many as either Oxford or Cambridge, and it is hoped that the scheme now taking practical form will remedy one of the chief defects of the institution by giving the opportunity of residence to students.

No one can ask honestly or hopefully to be delivered from temptation unless he has himself honestly and firmly determined to do the best he can to keep out of it.—John Ruskin.

AT THE END OF A YEAR AND OF TEN YEARS.

WITH this number of THE INQUIRER the present Editor completes ten years of service, and the retrospect, with all its light and shadow—many regrets for things left undone or badly done, and achievement immeasurably below the ideal of what such an organ of liberal religious thought and life ought to be—yet in the confidence of the generous judgment of many friends, leaves the balance on the side of gladness and thankfulness.

Writing this week, of necessity, before Christmas Day, we must leave the "Retrospect of 1907" for our New Year's number, and here dwell for a moment on some of the thoughts which belong to these ten years. They have seen the close of a century and of the long and beneficent reign of Queen VICTORIA. There came the first proposal by the TSAR of Russia for a Peace Conference, and two Conferences have been held at the Hague, but immediately after the first came the tragic years of our South African War, and later the terrible war between Russia and Japan. King EDWARD, our "Peace-Maker," succeeded VICTORIA, and later came a change of Government, with the sweeping Liberal victory. At Rome PRUS X. succeeded LEO XIII., and the separation of the Churches and the State in France, together with the strong movement of Liberalism within the Catholic Church, brought acute ecclesiastical problems to the front. In Scotland the establishment of the United Free Church was followed by an acute crisis of another kind.

Many great names have been added to the roll of the departed, GLADSTONE and BISMARCK among the first. In the year of Queen VICTORIA's death, President MCKINLEY was assassinated, and was succeeded by ROOSEVELT. The Church of England lost Archbishop TEMPLE, and in one previous year three notable bishops, CREIGHTON, STUBBS, and WESTCOTT. Of the statesmen we remember SALISBURY and HARCOURT, and in the world of art and literature, BURNE-

JONES and G. F. WATTS, RUSKIN and IBSEN. HERBERT SPENCER, AUGUSTE SABATIER, FRANCES POWER COBBE and ALBERT RÉVILLE also belonged to the higher realms of thought. In our own immediate connection we have lost JAMES MARTINEAU, JAMES STANSFELD, THOMAS ASHTON, WILLIAM RATHBONE, SIR HENRY TATE, MRS. JAMES WORTHINGTON, WILLIAM COLFOX, DAVID AINSWORTH, BROOKE HERFORD, RICHARD ARMSTRONG, and many more.

In our Church life the period has seen three meetings of the National Conference, at Leicester, Liverpool, and Oxford, and the meetings of the International Council of Religious Liberals in London, Amsterdam, Geneva, and Boston; the establishment of the Ministers' Pension Fund, and of Willaston School, and the greatly extended work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, through the initiative of the unknown friend who subscribes a thousand a year, and the further increase of support which that involves.

These are among the things which have brought the deepest interest to our work, and the growing sense of how much worth while it is to keep one's face turned steadfastly towards the duties and the great hopes of the coming time.

THE CULT OF PEACE.

"A NEW cult has been instituted in the world—a new principle in the relations of peoples, namely, peace by justice and right. Let us wish that the cult may spread more and more, both among Governments and peoples, that the blessings which it assures to both may ever attract new exponents, and that the monumental tower which will crown this edifice may be like a lighthouse, pointing to the nations the road of right and justice, the immutable supports of Peace."

These words of M. NELIDOFF, the president of the Hague Conference, spoken at the laying of the foundation stone of the Palace of Peace, at the Hague last July, are printed as a motto on Mr. H. S. PERRIS's little book, to which we have already called attention, "The Cult of the Rifle and the Cult of Peace." * The book, with some further illustrative matter, consists of a lecture given in August at a Free Church Summer School at Cambridge, and it is introduced by a friendly note from Dr. RENDEL HARRIS, President of the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches. The plea of the lecture is eminently in harmony with the Christmas season, when, as Dr. HARRIS says: "Even war-makers show a tendency to blush at the inconsistencies between their ideal and the ideal of the Master ('so gracious and so hallowed is the time')."

* T. Sealey Clark & Co., 1, Raequet-court, Fleet-street, E.C. 1s. net.

Mr. PERRIS once more presses home the lesson as to the crushing burden of armaments, and is specially earnest in his protest against the persistent effort to secure the training of the boys in our schools in the use of arms.

In this connection we are glad to take this opportunity to give further currency to the protest of Mr. ARTHUR ROWNTREE, of Bootham School, York, in his letter to the Association of Headmasters, against the general introduction of practice in rifle-shooting into public schools.

"I protest," writes Mr. ROWNTREE, against the linking together of the educational and military systems. The combative instinct of boys is sufficiently apparent to every schoolmaster. The British school-boy is no angel, even if incipient wings are concealed under an Eton jacket; he is a filibuster by nature and his combative instinct needs no careful culture. It is his intellectual side and his individuality that need intensive cultivation; the Headmasters propose to strengthen the side that is already too strong. The training of a boy's judgment is a difficult and delicate task: in comparison it is child's play to teach him to hit the mark at a thousand yards. He is ready enough to apply physical force, quick enough to scorn the gentler virtues; he needs no encouragement in these plastic days to look to the rifle as the arbiter of the future. After school-days he is better able to weigh the question for himself and exercise his own moral judgment.

* * * * *

"If we desire to sum up the aim of our educational system in a single sentence, we say it is a spiritual and ethical uplifting. What about the aim of the military system? It aims at preparing for war; and in spite of war's heroism and self-sacrifice, no one ventures to say that the aim of war is a spiritual and ethical uplifting any more than is Unemployment at home or the plague in India. An American statesman reminded us lately that 'war is the most futile and ferocious of all human follies.' Mr. BALFOUR has told us that war 'always has the effect of retarding the progress of humanity and civilisation.' Are we to train our boys to help or to retard the progress of humanity and civilisation? The application of ethical principles to international affairs helps the progress of humanity and civilisation by carrying one step further the guidance of life by rational principles.

* * * * *

"It is not only dreamers of dreams, but also practical men, who are beginning to see a gleam of light through the gloom of our social life, and a broad path opening out for the extension of the reign of law between nation and nation. In calling your attention to the educational aspects of this question, I am at one with you in desiring to train boys for national work and service, and I submit that it is our privilege and duty as headmasters to see that the young men who leave our schools are qualified by mental habits and training to take their places as leaders of rational movements, able and willing to guide their country in paths of peace."

BOSTON INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS.

THE WORLD WAR WITH INTOXICANTS.

BY THE REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

THE Church which shall be equal to the needs of man will not ignore one of the most urgent of those needs, viz., the need of deliverance from and protection against intoxicants. Alcoholic drink has been declared by high authorities to be the most destructive material enemy of the human race. If this declaration comes within measurable distance of justification, what body of religious people can hold aloof from the warfare it implies? While philosophers discuss nice points of speculation, while erudite students dexterously reconstitute the past and dreamers forecast the future, the problem of how to conquer intoxicants cries out for the immediate attention of all practical men. Granted that many other perils summon the thinker to action; here is an evil without a rival, for we have here to deal with the problem of a dangerous appetite, abetted by a vast commercial interest. Its dimensions are appalling. The Special Commissioner of the United States Labour Department, Dr. Gould, said:—"The danger resident in these huge national liquor bills reaches beyond misery and moral degradation. Civilisation itself is menaced by this growing economic waste." In saying this I think he had in mind, not his own country alone, where in proportion the waste is considerably less than in others. We, at any rate, coming together from many lands, know that his solemn warning finds ample illustration in them all. The evil arising from the use of intoxicants is world wide, and calls for a world-wide campaign against it. The language of the Commissioner is in no degree exaggerated. The resources of wisdom and vigour in the world's ruling races are, no doubt, great, and appear equal to most things, but in this connection, even the strongest nations are almost paralysed, while subject races wither away under this plague, like sheep under the pestilence.

No historic age has been free from it, and always and everywhere the story of loss and misery has been the same. But in our age the problem has assumed a more formidable shape than hitherto. The appetite for something to drug the mind and veil the face of reality with temporary illuiveness was sufficiently difficult to meet when its cravings were left to the casual stimulus of local circumstances. To-day, the trade venture in alcoholic drink is bound up with huge finance. The conditions of modern commerce and the facilities for rapid distribution arm this business with a far-reaching effect quite beyond precedent. All the arts and devices discoverable by eager and ingenious men, who act together for lucrative gains, promote its extension. It is powerful to manipulate houses of legislature, to control local administration, including police; and as for its advertising, that is on so liberal a scale that great journals are said "to float on whisky—with some assistance from soap." No one who has had experience in this matter will deny that such a sleepless financial interest is much harder to fight than the intermittent appetite upon which it thrives.

We must keep these facts steadily before us, if we are intelligently to enter upon this field of battle. Of course, such an interest puts the best face it can upon the trade in which it is engaged. Its pleas are specious, but they can deceive few. The trade in intoxicants, say its promoters, exists for the convenience of the public. "What people want people will have." They ask in the name of freedom, may not a man have his glass if he likes, and if he pays for it! Sometimes they assume a tone of raillery, and demand in the name of sociability whether, because you think yourself virtuous, there shall be "no more cakes and ale." Finally, they pose as friends of virility and muscle, and roundly declare that a nation of water drinkers must go down in the struggle for existence before a nation able to quaff deep its beer and rum. Considering, however, the swift and certain loss of liberty entailed on many a poor fellow's glass when he has had it, considering the innumerable quarrels and fights that have so often ended the tavern's social hour, and, above all, considering the deplorable physical deterioration of large masses of our people through the use of alcohol, more than through any other one thing, there is something about these familiar pleas that approaches the magnificent. But, like the Charge of the Light Brigade, though magnificent, they are not war. The real moving force is not the public weal, but the publican's wealth. Sheer covetousness, callous, brutal, the blind and reckless desire of gain at whatever cost to the community, voilà l'ennemi!

The formidable trade interests now confronting the reformer do occasionally, indeed, get an academic support from gentlemen who do not happen to live next door to a public-house. These amiable theorists must be exonerated, of course, from the suspicion of having any commercial or political axe of their own to grind. Liberty is the breath of their nostrils, their one hope for man; they would fully sympathise with the mood of Frederick the Great when he announced that if his theologically minded subjects of Valangin would insist on being damned eternally, he had nothing to say against it. Restriction of any kind is abhorrent to such fanatics of freedom; to them the word abstinence sounds almost immoral, and prohibition savours of downright tyranny. If you say society must at some sacrifice protect itself against the perils of drinking habits, these people turn philosophers, and coolly argue that society's drinking habits did not evolve without "sufficient reason." Finally, under more or less pressure, they confess they like a drop themselves, and then you understand why they champion their wine decanter as if it were the Holy Grail. Between liberty and liking, the cause of Abstinence, Restriction, Prohibition fails to win their support. And yet, if they would but leave their prepossessions awhile, and listen to facts!

The pertinent facts, alas, need no long seeking. We have at hand evidence from ages the most distant and races the most diverse. Its weight is overwhelming. Granted that Bacchus has been a god of mirth and jollity, he has charged mankind heavily for his jest. Were it only in money's worth, the bill is enormous. We pay for drink in Great Britain each year nearly three times what that very expensive Boer War cost us each year it lasted. So much for the drink itself. What we pay for the consequences of the drink is incalculable. Of course, economy is a dull virtue, especially when one has plenty of cash. But when the richest states of Europe are so near to bankruptcy that millions of their people herd together in dens that defy decency—in slums that Tennyson called expressively "the warrens of the poor"—and when most men in civilised lands all over the world are such daily slaves to a tyrant they call "business," that they cannot afford rationally to enjoy their earthly existence till another—heavenly or otherwise—draws near, it would seem worth while to consider this expenditure on drink, and especially on its consequences, and to ask whether it is necessary and who pays the bill.

In Great Britain alone there are fully a million paupers, with probably double that number chronically on the verge of pauperism—say, one in thirteen of the population. Now, we know it is easy and foolish to make rash and sweeping statements as to the causes of this mass of poverty, with its attendant misery and degradation; but take a simple fact. Very careful inquiries have been made by capable and responsible persons from time to time; and the Manchester Guardians of the poor, for instance, announced, not so very long ago, that over 51 per cent. of the cases of pauperism in their district were found to be directly caused by intemperance. Probably few would doubt that there were many additional cases where, if indirect, this factor was no less an influential one. There is abundant ground for believing that this state of things is typical of pauperism generally.

Again, there are some fourteen thousand prisoners convicted yearly in the United Kingdom, and their miserable and desperate army is kept at bay by an extensive array of police and prison-warders, with the costly supplement of judges and courts and the whole paraphernalia of justice. The Rt. Hon. C. T. Ritchie, speaking from his personal knowledge as Home Secretary (in an administration not thought to be unfriendly to the drink trade), said in the House of Commons in 1902—"I do not think I am going wide of the mark when I say that nine-tenths of the greatest of all the crimes have been, in the main, caused by drunkenness." The chairman of the Prisons Commission of Scotland found that the same proportion held good as regards all classes of crimes, great and small. Officials of unimpeachable authority and freedom from prejudice testified, over and over again, before Lord Peel's Commission eight years ago, that but for the drink there would be little or no work for police or prisons. The same story comes from other lands. The French Minister of Justice is reported as saying that "no less than 53 per cent. of the persons convicted of murder, 57 per cent. of those convicted of arson, and 90 per cent. of those convicted for causing bodily harm are confirmed drunkards." The New South Wales Drink Commission, while deprecating a "tendency to exaggerate the percentage of crimes directly caused by drink" found that very few of the witnesses examined by them placed it lower than 75. The statement is attributed to Mr. Carrol D. Wright, that "72 per cent. of the crimes in Boston are liquor crimes," and the Massachusetts State Board of Charities are credited with the report in 1893 that "the proportion of crime traceable to intemperance must be set down, as heretofore, as not less than four-fifths." But I might simply fill my paper with similar evidence, supplied, not by cold-water cranks, but by persons of the most exceptional knowledge of the subject, and of the coolest impartiality,—judges, magistrates, commanders of regiments, captains of ships, chaplains, governors of prisons, inspectors, state commissioners, and other experts, who all find in this one evil the most fertile source of all kinds of breaches of the law.

Thus, because of the beer-barrel and the gin-tap, the whole community goes in fear and jeopardy, and has to maintain a costly and ugly machinery to get along at all. As for the people who individually suffer by these things, who shall tell of their woes. Homes, so-called, are continued in misery, or finally broken up in shame. Nearly all cases of desertion are traceable to this evil, on the part of husband or wife. Scarcely any instances occur of cruelty to children, such as brings the offenders before the law, where drink is not found to have deadened the parent's natural affection. The divorce courts repeat the same monotonous story of drink-weakened moral fibre, with the most disastrous results. And who is ignorant of the shame and sorrows, which relatives in agony seek to hide, and concerning which decent folk keep a silence intended to be merciful, which, without emerging into the glare of the Courts, exist none the less really beneath the surface of Society. At one end of the scale, little children by thousands die untimely, or survive only to bear the blight of their dram-poisoned nursing. At the other, bright and clever natures, once an honour and a pride to their friends, go down into the gutter. These are the every-day experiences, not the unusual visitations, of organised communities boasting of their civilisation. I speak not here of the state of things where crude humanity becomes the prey of the drink-seller in the purlieus of the docks, of the far-off quarries and mines, and the poor villages of aboriginal races.

One more item in this already unparalleled "drink bill" must be mentioned. There is a feature of modern life which must perplex, if it does not absolutely dismay, every student of human affairs. We often speak hopefully, confidently, of progress, and believe that ameliorative influences are slowly but surely raising the general level of intelligence the world over. But what about that dread shadow on the path of the dominant races—insanity? The figures seem to show unmistakably that this is a growing malady. If it is really increasing at the rate that the records of the asylums appear to prove, if part of the apparent growth is not to be set down to more careful observation and registration, then indeed the prospects of mankind would seem almost desparate. But whatever conclusion we form as to that, we have testimony from all sides, from Germany, France, Belgium, and other European states, as well as from the different English-speaking nations that belt the globe, that alcohol is one of the chief ascertainable causes of insanity. No one can really be surprised at such testimony who has at all intelligently followed the course of modern investigation with regard to the structure of the brain, and the action of alcohol upon its delicate tissues. There is no longer room for doubt that, just as a clumsy finger and thumb spoil the bloom on a peach, so the clutch of this drug worsens every time the tender organ of mind. The damage may at first be slight, and bounteous nature is often lavish in putting forth remedial energy; but there comes an hour when under incessant injury, if slight seeming, the peach's bloom is ruined. Formerly, only the grosser forms of alcoholic poisoning were much noticed; but modern research, carried on in the laboratories of unprejudiced scientists, East and West, shows that even what are called "dietetic doses" tend to the irretrievable injury of brain and nerves. Well might the great Edison say, in explanation of his abstinence from alcohol, "I have a better use for my brains." But, really, there is no need for anyone, who opens his eyes and ears, to run about in search of the verdicts of savants! Who has not seen ample evidence, before the scientists told us why, that the imbibition of alcohol at once weakens the mind's self-control, just while it flatters the drinker with an altogether mistaken notion of his own wit, wisdom, and brilliance in general? Long before the stage is reached when friends grow anxious and apprehensive, we see around us people who are otherwise sensible set free in talk, blabbing of their neighbour's business if not their own, and cajoled into bargains which they will repent of to-morrow. Young fellows, usually shrewd and gentlemanly enough, grow excited and loosed from the wholesome checks of modesty and self-respect. Grave and reverend seniors with flushed face and roving eye draw near to the bench and cap of the fool. Girls grow giddy and perilously adventurous—in short, here is the modern Circe's cup. And, when the poor victims have drained it, their blood bears its baleful ingredient along their life tides with such deadly sureness that the next generation rises with accusing finger to say, "Thus didst thou!" We have in London special schools for "mentally defective" children—those poor dull pupils who would be utterly unable to keep up with the lessons of average children, and who must be catered for separately. Official inquiries into the family history of one hundred consecutive cases of such children showed that in forty-two there was a clear history of drunkenness on the part of one at least of the parents. In only 6 per cent. of normal children was there found to be a drunken parent.

Poverty, crime, immorality, ineffectiveness, insanity, disease—where shall the awful indictment end? As to disease let this one eloquent fact suffice. The poor publican himself (I do not say the highly respectable shareholder in the brewery company, but the man who froths the pot), is the surest victim of his own wares. The returns of the Registrar-General show that this class of citizen dies off far more quickly than any other—even those engaged in notoriously "dangerous" trades. In fact, our British authorities, officially declare the making and selling of intoxicants to be the "deadliest and most dangerous of occupations." Talk about missions to the poor savages—is it not time that a mission were established to rescue the wretched victims of so fearful a scourge?

Now, I feel sure that on reviewing these and similar facts, there cannot be one intelligent person whose mind is not fully convinced as to the gravity of the problem, and the urgency of solving it. Where disagreement comes in is as regards the steps proposed to be taken. Frankly, I confess myself one of those who would fight intoxicants by all honourable methods, and I would accept any ally who would lessen the sphere of their influence. There has been, hitherto, too much quarrelling in the face of the enemy. Undoubtedly, there is need for the most careful discrimination of conditions, and the most prudential calculation of the consequence of different courses of action. But when the house is burning it is somewhat late to discuss hydrostatics. Whoever brings but a bucket shall be welcome. Many here to-day may have their own favourite lines of advance; so long as we do advance at all, let us not too severely criticise one another. In different countries and localities different methods are appropriate. In some places, pioneers of reform have to be content to work very much alone and by moral suasion; but even in Russia, where the chance of influencing legislation seems smallest, the prophet's voice is not raised in vain, as we see by the formation of an abstaining society through the teachings of Tolstoy. In France, on the other hand, we have seen the civic authorities in Paris publishing and very widely disseminating a placard setting forth the dangers of drink, the mistake of supposing that it imparts muscular energy, and the fearful heritage of misery it bequeaths. This placard has been copied in some communities in Great Britain; but those strict economists who watch so unceasingly over the interests of "the trade" have here and there secured a decision that the printing and issuing of such material is ultra vires! In Belgium, one notices there has been a singular originality in the method adopted in certain quarters. This hard-working little country appears to have a reputation for drunkenness which only my own country can rival. But amongst reformers there, the Socialist party has appealed to its supporters to abstain from alcohol for several reasons, the third and last being that abstinence would improve their health, the second that it would provide funds for political propaganda, and the first and foremost, that it would cripple the Government's finances! Well, we remember how St. Paul regarded that preaching of the Gospel which was not altogether from purest Gospel motives. Whatever the motive, let them but "preach Christ," even "of envy," and he would rejoice.

Amongst the many attempts made in different countries, the Scandinavian method of grappling with the evils of intemperance stands out prominently. It has been much criticised as developing a municipal interest in the continuance of the trade in intoxicants; but, at any rate, the evils in Scandinavia itself are far less in evidence now than before the trade was taken over from private hands. The number of recruits, for example, rejected as unfit for service is now far below what it used to be. And as to national fitness, not for the war of violence, but for that competition which exists everywhere, the words of the Prussian Count Douglas were surely wise when he said, on introducing a temperance Bill into the Prussian Diet in 1902, "those countries where temperance was inculcated and practised would ultimately secure the advantage. In particular" (the quotation is from The Times), "he directed attention to the success of the temperance movement in the United States of America, where there were ten millions of abstainers." Reverting to the question of co-operative method, attempts are being made in England, though on no very large scale, to get the trade into the hands of trusts and companies who for little or no profit will be content to meet existing demands for drink, without fostering an exaggerated business. I am afraid it will be long before any such methods will become general. We are left to struggle as best we can, socially and politically, with that vast commercial interest which every year extends its hold upon general support through its lists of shareholders all over the kingdom. It is estimated that something like one hundred millions sterling are subscribed as stock in the various companies represented on our exchanges. This widespread social and financial power has great weight in both Houses of Parliament, and in local councils. It commands the services of the most dexterous agents in seeking means to avoid restrictive laws. The motto unblushingly put forth by the engineer, of this party is "Our trade, our politics." With wistful eyes many of us look to this great family of States in the West, and to our own Colonies, where the enlightened principle of "Local Option" in one form or other has been enforced. We have seen enough benefit in the little areas that exist even in our land, where the drink is not forced upon a community, to wish that the people generally might at least be permitted to say whether it should be there or not.

I do not conceive, however, that my duty to-day is to discuss and weigh the merits of any particular method. What I do plead for is for your real and permanent interest in this vital problem of our day, for your personal decision, and for co-operation all along the line. Earlier in this paper I spoke of Abstinence, Restriction, Prohibition. It appears to me that this order is the sensible and practical one. Some excellent people, I know, speak of abstinence as if it were an extreme measure. Large, and so far as I know, useful societies exist, the members of which are allowed to take a glass at meals and at no other time. Other people, the bulk of decent citizens, I suppose, do not even bind themselves to this, but take their drink in "moderation" as they call it. Now, I am sure that no one in an assembly like this would presume to dictate to another's conscience; let each be fully persuaded. But how any man who has ever seen with his own eyes the ruined humanity, the blighted homes, the shattered health, the misery and shame of his fellow-creatures, can any longer touch this accursed thing, I cannot understand! Were it anything else that wrought so much evil on earth, if it did not come with an insinuating tickle of the palate, and a delusive touch of flattery upon the nerves, as it takes the reason prisoner, there is no man but would exile this pest for ever from his home, and if possible from the community. Is that pleasant taste, then, really worth enjoying, in such company and at such a price? As for taking pecuniary profit out of such a trade, what pity is large enough, what horror deep enough, to cover such a tainted transaction? Cain killed Abel, but at least he didn't do it for money!

We may talk about international unity, and arbitration, and the triumph of the Church Universal, and all that; but let every man be fully assured of this—there cannot be peace on earth, or sweet religion ruling in our hearths and homes, till this "devil in solution" has been exorcised from our midst. Abstain, and you set him at a distance at once. "Others will not abstain?" Then restrict their chances of being egged on to excess. Absolute Prohibition is the final happy goal, not, however, to be really successful till the mind of the people runs abreast of the law; and that it shall do so is the task of the Churches specially to secure. We, in particular, are met together as those who are striving towards the creation of a religious life free alike from needless fears and baseless hopes, but grounded firmly in the solid rock of the soul's own experiences. Who, if not we, should recognise that an intelligent faith needs clear brains to conceive it, that a conquering and world-redeeming practical religion needs the soundest, healthiest men and women to carry it to victory? We, of the Liberal Churches are so far from seeing our work "done" as sometimes we hear, or even inertly say, that we are really only at the beginning of things. We are here at this time to knit a little closer the ties of understanding and consent between thinkers usually far scattered, to feel our common needs and partake of our common inspirations. Shall we separate without an understanding in respect to this most practical, most pressing of all social reforms? Shall we not go to our different spheres of labour, resolved to do our duty in this regard, if by any means we may save some? It is ours especially to educate our own young people in habits and principles of perfect sobriety, to stimulate our fellow-worshippers to more practical zeal in this outstanding social work, and to raise our voice as citizens against every encroachment by the reckless exploiters of human weakness, while we endeavour to secure healthier conditions of home-life and occupation, and more rational forms of recreation for the people. Above all, we have to appeal to the diviner element in every heart; and to plead, not only in the name of human pity, but of human honour, against so horrible a desecration of life as the use of intoxicants involves.

We need more than the patriarchs of old to go forth at eventide to meditate, and to seek in the quietness of the heart the presence of God.—Ephraim Peabody.

AMERICAN IMPRESSIONS OF DELEGATES TO THE BOSTON INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A VERY interesting conference and public meeting were held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday, December 12, arranged by the District Association with the idea of focussing the impressions of delegates who attended the Boston Conference, and of eliciting suggestions that might prove helpful to our churches and Sunday schools. The afternoon conference was of a more or less informal nature, the President of the Association, the Rev. Charles Peach, being in the chair. The points of general agreement may be shortly summarised. All had been struck by the architectural beauty and finished equipment of the American churches. Minister delegates dwelt, as upon a delightful theme, on the one-service-a-day institution and the long summer vacation. One delegate, after paying tribute to the high ability and distinction of the American minister's work, was sure that our ministers would do much better if they attempted less than was at present expected of them. Several appreciative references were made to the fact that there is no Established Church in America. Even Unitarian ministers are classed among the clergy, and our cause, as one delegate remarked, has "some appearance of popularity." It was noted that our Church in America is on the whole a middle-class Church, the ministry to all classes, which is our ideal, not being attempted, or at any rate being attempted only exceptionally. No criticism was passed upon this feature of American church life. The President, indeed, wondered if our American brethren were not, after all, right in organising their worship to meet the needs of the type of mind to which our faith seems most directly to appeal. With regard to Sunday schools one point was emphasised by almost every speaker, namely, that our congregations do not realise their responsibility to the children of their own members as American congregations do. In America the Sunday school is usually composed of children of members of the congregation, and a definite endeavour is made to give them systematic religious instruction.

In the evening a largely attended public meeting was held. The PRESIDENT, the Rev. Charles Peach, again took the chair, and said that the interest evidenced by the attendance at that meeting was justified, for America had a great deal to teach us. In that country there was no Established Church, but interest in religion was more widespread than among us. The Unitarian Churches there were finer, better organised and equipped than in England. Hence he concluded that the association between the State and religion might be severed, and that neither religion nor the churches would suffer. He wished to deal especially, however, with social questions, and, with regard to the three branches concerning which he had made inquiries, America compared on the whole well and favourably with this country. In connection with the Temperance Question he had found that there were no barmaids in America. He had been assured that not a single girl or woman was employed in the liquor traffic throughout the United States. Why should not we in England follow this lead? Further, drink was not sold at the railway stations in America. Compare that with our system. Altogether, America was ahead of us in temperance. In education America had proved, what had been proved again and again, that it can never be predicted what the Roman Catholic party will or will not do. The Roman Catholics had there adapted themselves to a system of public schools which served all sects and classes of the community. This had taken place, although there was no difficulty about money. The Roman Catholics had built separate sectarian schools, but could not get the children because the parents insisted on their children going to the public and national school. As to the general social question, America was a younger country, and the working classes were better off, better paid, better educated, better housed than with us. The separate Labour Party and movement were much less developed therefore. The question of the relations between the two races, white and black, was America's great problem. Many Americans felt that the position was so acute, the antagonism so bitter, the feeling so intense, that at any hour it was possible a spark might fire the train of dangerous passion, and a racial war of extermination be begun. Thus was illustrated the truth that in solving one problem another was created. Slavery had gone. The relation of the coloured to the white race remained. Assurances were given them on all hands in America that it was the greatest mistake to give political power to coloured races. They are still children, and nothing but friction, suspicion, and hostility results from their possession of power. If America could survive this racial problem, there was a great future before it. It was a wonderful and beautiful country. England was still the old country to the people across the Atlantic, but really this new people was the child and heir of all Europe. It was the great stage on which the problems of our race would be fought out by coming generations.

The Rev. W. HOLMSHAW took as his topic "The Women's Alliance." He had been especially impressed by this national alliance of Unitarian and other liberal Christian women. He had attended the annual meeting of the Alliance, and no meeting had interested him more. He had realised what a driving power there was in women. They were the hope and mainstay of all churches and denominations. The Women's Alliance was organised in 1890, and had made wonderful progress during the seventeen years of its existence. The objects of the founders were (1) to quicken the religious life of Unitarian Churches and to bring women into close co-operation and fellowship. (2) To institute local organisations for missionary and denominational work. (3) To collect and disseminate information. (4) To find out ways and means for more efficient usefulness. The Alliance included many branches, and each branch was locally independent. The organisation as a whole concerned itself with general affairs. What was its method of working? It was through a series of committees. There was a Finance Committee; there was a Study Class Committee, which brought before the branches denominational matters of general interest—before the Conference, for example, the members of the Alliance were posted as to the liberal movement the world over. There was a Cheerful Letter Exchange Committee. This feature was both new and good. It was the duty of this committee to look after mutual encouragement between the branches. The idea was that a large and prosperous branch ought to encourage other branches not perhaps so successful. Papers were exchanged between the branches, and cuttings from newspapers, all with the design of producing cheerfulness. There was a Travelling Library Committee, carrying on its activities on a far larger scale than anything we were accustomed to. The Appeals Committee was one of the best things organised by the Women's Alliance. We in England advertise our wants in the denominational papers and beg. In America, if a church was in need of money, an appeal was sent to the National Alliance. It came before the Appeals Committee. It was considered and judged upon its merits, and if favoured was recommended to all the branches. Finally, there was a Post Office Mission Committee. This mission had done wonderful work in establishing new congregations. Their rule was first to come into touch with individuals. When it was found that a group of individuals in any place were interested, the Alliance reported concerning it to the American Unitarian Association. The Association took the matter up, and sent a man to see what could be done. If there was any prospect of success money was found, and a minister was sent to build up a congregation if he could. This explained the astonishing number of new congregations established in America from year to year. The total sum raised by the Women's Alliance for denominational purposes from 1890-1907 was £257,635. It was a distinctly missionary organisation. Its endeavour was to establish and sustain churches, and to stimulate interest in the affairs of the denomination. Help was given to students training for the ministry. The young people of all the churches were kept in mind. The Women's Alliance was in fact the mainstay of American Unitarianism. If only we could organise our women after the American model our position would be greatly strengthened. It only needed that the women of our churches should do in concert what they now do individually. We should then feel that a new spring of power had risen amongst us.

The Rev. J. A. PEARSON, after congratulating the Association on that splendid meeting, proceeded to speak on the Young Men's Christian Union. There was, he said, in America as in England, a Y.M.C.A., but members of that Association there as here had to believe in Jesus as their God and Saviour. In the Young Men's Christian Union, with the founding and working of which Unitarians had had much to do, creeds were in abeyance. Humanity was the bond of union. Jews were coming in and were being welcomed. He had visited the Y.M.C.U. in Boston one Sunday, and had been greatly interested and delighted by what he found. There was a library of 18,000 volumes, and in the library and adjacent reading-rooms at least a hundred men of various conditions were sitting reading. There was a large lecture hall with seating capacity for 502, and services and lectures were arranged for Sunday evenings. This club was a factor in the social life of 5,700 men members. Classes were held there. There were a gymnasium and bathrooms. Entertainments and lectures were provided. There were benevolent committees, and a committee for country holidays for children. There was an employment bureau. But true success was not bounded by numbers. Force of character and good citizenship were the fruits of the Young Men's Christian Union. It was founded in 1851, and had a permanent income of £1,100. How did all this apply to us? It should help us to recognise the broad humanitarian spirit we had from our ancestors. In Manchester, with the growing work of the Sunday School and Manchester District Associations, the time would soon be here to organise, to organise on a broad basis. While belonging to a denomination our basis of organisation should be wide enough to bring in all willing to be helped. We ought to take the hint. How? In 1862 the Memorial Hall was built in Manchester, and was intended to house a library, and form a meeting-place for Unitarians. There on that spot they had premises almost entirely suited to a piece of work that was really catholic in its scope. Catholicity must provide a place where those can be encouraged to give expression to catholic ideas who are living a catholic life. We must be concerned first for the young life of our own churches, but next for all young life that we have the privilege of influencing.

The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, of Liverpool, addressed the meeting on "Thoughts on Theology in America." On his voyage back to England he had been in touch, in the persons of the passengers, with all the theologies of America! Those who entered America by the St. Lawrence found along its banks the Catholic Church established. Entering the States, one expected to meet with a great amount of real free thought. It was not so much found, however. Religious novelties were followed rather. One advantage there certainly was of a practical nature. There was no establishment of antiquated theology. The American Episcopal Church was becoming the fashionable church, and called other Protestant bodies schismatics. But the Episcopalians had years ago cast off the Athanasian creed. It was still in the Prayer Book, but was not in the rubrics. The Nicene Creed was kept, but even so the American Episcopal Church started better off than our own English Church. As regards the Presbyterian Church, the Westminster Confession was going. The Methodist Episcopal Church was very broad in reality, and was in for a reduction of essentials. The Baptist Synod had arrived at the conclusion at which Baxter arrived. They did not want the creeds of other men, and so made the Bible their basis. The Baptists had started on a good open way. The air of freedom was affecting even the Roman Catholics. The Roman Catholic Church was tending more and more to become the Roman Catholic Church of America.

On the whole America was more orthodox than might have been expected. Old shackles and creeds were being thrown off, however. The great lesson was that the social, political, moral and international future was wrapped up with the one question of theology on the open way. That was the way to international comity.

The Rev. T. P. SPEDDING next spoke on "A Business Policy." Since 1875, he said, 210 new churches had been founded in America largely by the activity of one association of women. Businesslike methods were necessary. Our people in America were as keen and businesslike in their churches as in their own business affairs. A spiritual revival was certain of success if it were backed up by business aptitude and earnestness. It was no matter how broad and enlightened we were if we were not businesslike. In America there was a Central Unitarian Association and District Societies covering the country. In addition the whole area was divided into five divisions, and for each men were set apart. There were thirteen missionaries not in charge of churches. These were building up churches of the unattached, and preventing the loss of people who move to a place where no church exists. This work was greatly needed with us. A list had been put into his hand of 100 people connected with Manchester churches who had removed from the district. The money power of the church often went with those people. The American Unitarian Association received four or five times as much income as our British and Foreign Unitarian Association. They had a system of chapel building loans. Half the cost of building a church was guaranteed on the understanding that it should be repaid in ten years. Concluding, Mr. Spedding paid a tribute to American hospitality, and spoke of the envy he felt with regard to the beautiful church buildings and their wonderful historical associations in America. We had associations. Why did we not cultivate them more? He believed in the future of our churches if in addition to spiritual fervour, business ability could be brought to bear.

Mr. Councillor WIGLEY was the last speaker, his subject being "Sunday School's." Referring first to the points raised by previous speakers, he advocated the appointment of an influential committee to see if we could not make better and larger use of the Memorial Hall. A Women's Alliance and a Unitarian Laymen's Club ought to be established. In the Manchester district a larger comprehension of our duty was needed; a larger Unitarian public spirit. What a power we might then exercise on the mind of the country. Turning to his special topic he remarked that, entering America by way of Canada, he had visited in Montreal one Sunday afternoon a Methodist Sunday school. He mentioned this school because of the method of instruction practised there. He found that one subject was being taught in every class throughout the school, namely, "See thou forget not God." The superintendent, at the close, took up the subject and dealt with it from the desk, and then announced the subject for the following Sunday. It struck him that there was something to be said for this method, although it should not, in his opinion, be invariable. In Boston, at the Church of the Disciples, he found they were trying the interesting experiment of a professionally conducted Sunday school. The lady superintendent and her staff of teachers were all paid. Last year £300 had been set aside for the use of the school. There was a definite scheme of graduated instruction at the school. We had nothing like it in England. We were wanting in method, organisation, and efficiency. At the Sunday school of the Church of the Disciples there were 82 scholars, chiefly children of the congregation. The teachers received the children as their parents came to church, and the school and church service were concurrent. The course of instruction was mapped out in periods of two years. Kindergarten from the ages of 4 to 6, primary 6 to 8, junior 8 to 10, sub-junior 12 to 14, senior 14 to 16, advanced 16 to 18. There was also a class of graduates for special study, ages 18 and upwards. Religious, moral, and social elements of education were provided throughout the course. Salaried service was deemed essential to the scheme. We ought, continued Mr. Wigley, to do something to improve our teaching methods. More regular and more trained service were needed, especially in view of the fact that secular education was coming in our day schools. His general impression of such Sunday schools as he had seen in America was that congregations gave them more hearty and liberal support than with us. On the whole, American Sunday schools were very much alive. In Chicago there was a Social Service Department in connection with them. Lectures, addresses, visits to schools were organised, all with a view to encourage the discussion of social problems. He would conclude by suggesting that the Memorial Hall would be a good centre to use for preparatory work in connection with our Sunday schools.

The PRESIDENT, after expressing the thanks of the meeting to the speakers, and especially to the Rev. H. D. Roberts, as a visitor from outside the district, pronounced the benediction, and thus brought a most helpful and inspiring meeting to a close. Twenty-one out of the twenty-three churches of the Association were represented.

THE Rev. W. W. Chynoweth Pope, of Lewisham, was the one of our ministers who went furthest afield during the recent visit to America, and now on behalf of his Church Building Fund he announces a course of six lantern lectures, on Wednesday evenings, Jan. 8 and 22, Feb. 5 and 19, March 4 and 18, each illustrated by a hundred slides. Canada, Yellowstone Park, Yosemite, the Grand Canyon, the Mammoth Cave, and New England are the six subjects. A single ticket for the course may be had for 5s.; tickets for single lectures are 1s. each.

WHEN you have closed your doors and made darkness within, remember never to say that you are alone. For you are not alone. God, too, is present there, and your guardian spirit: and what need have they of light to see what you are doing?—Epictetus.

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORK OF TO-DAY.

IMPORTANT developments are taking place in connection with our Sunday Schools in the north. The old days of the four r's—reading, writing, arithmetic and religion—are past, never to return. The intermediate period of uncertain compromise is passing, the new era is just beginning to dawn. The Sunday Schools are going to fill an honoured and indispensable place once more in our educational system. We are none of us for secular education, we are only for limiting State control and endowment to secular subjects. Religious education is more important than ever, but it must be given in the homes, the churches, and the Sunday Schools. Hence the need for the highest possible efficiency in Sunday School teaching. If the trained teachers of the day schools can no longer give religious education in the day schools, then we must train the Sunday School teachers. This is what we are beginning to do in the north. We are bringing the Sunday School teachers into touch with the University. A special course of lectures has already been given by one of the professors of the Victoria University of Manchester in Manchester, Bolton, and elsewhere. The course was attended by great numbers of teachers of all classes of Sunday Schools. Another course is to follow, and there are plans under discussion for examinations and the granting of university certificates.

Another discovery of recent years is that our scholars have bodies as well as souls, bodies which often grow frail and feeble in our great towns, and droop and fade in the factory and mill. Our Northern Association is therefore trying to be the Good Samaritan to the bodies, while it aims at being a physician to the souls of our children. For ten years the Manchester Association has maintained a convalescent home for younger scholars at Blackpool. Red Cross, as the home is called, was the gift of Mr. C. C. Grundy, and to his initiative is therefore due a work which is now growing to large proportions. Early in the New Year a new home will be opened at Great Hucklow, Buxton, for elder girls and teachers. The new home is a fine stone-built house, the former residence of the Rev. Lawrence Scott. Set in its own grounds of nearly five acres, the home will be an ideal quiet retreat to tired and worn-down girls both in summer and winter, for even in winter the dry air of the moorland, a thousand feet above sea level, is a great improvement on the climate of our northern towns.

In Great Hucklow also is the third home of the Association, now in the eighth year of its existence. This is a holiday home, the first of its kind, it is believed, in the world. It aims at providing a week's holiday in the fine moorland country of the Buxton area for those great numbers of our scholars who otherwise could never get a holiday at all. Its ideal is to have a whole school transferred to it so far as its capacity will allow, and this is often realised. Minister, teachers, and scholars to the number of one hundred go there for a happy week together to get to know each other better than ever before. During the past season we had over fifteen hundred visitors, and nearly fourteen hundred of them stayed a full week. In many ways it was the best season we have ever had. It marked the entire passing away of the little friction which would sometimes arise between us and our neighbours. Children fresh to the country would often run wild. Now they know how to behave, and not one complaint came to spoil the pleasure of our last season. Our neighbours are really very good to us, and we in turn have brought life and trade to a quiet little village. Every Friday there is a concert at the Home, when the villagers come up in large numbers, and most weeks the Home party play the village lads at cricket, while in the winter we are glad to give the frequent use of our fine rooms for village purposes. Our season runs from Whit-week to the end of September, and the weeks are apportioned out with great care. Our own schools have first choice. Then comes a mothers' week, with some fifty mothers, and nearly as many babies, from our Domestic Missions. High Pavement, Nottingham, sent the poor little beneficiaries of its Lend-a-Hand Club for a wonderful week, and another week was taken up by a Sheffield mill-girls' club. Manchester, in addition to its schools in the Association, claimed weeks for the Nichols Hospital and the Fielden Training School parties. And so the tale was made up. Nearly fourteen hundred had their week in the country, and not one of them but wished to come again. It is good for the children. It is good for the life of the school. If only we could be sure of the weather, then it would be ideal. To have a hundred children shut up in the dining-room on a wet day is a test to the ingenuity of the best teacher. Some day we hope to add a covered play-room to our equipment, and it would be a great boom. But that cannot be just yet, because we have to make the Home self-supporting and to make extensions out of the profits. This would seem a hopeless task to those who have not tried it, to feed hungry children for five shillings a week and make sufficient profit to keep up all stores of crockery, linen, &c., and make necessary extensions. But we manage to do it, and the new luxury of the past season, paid for out of profits, has been two new bath-rooms. But a covered play-room would cost, we are told, one hundred and fifty pounds, so we must wait and save. Another thing we want is a good gramophone. We have a piano, but all parties do not bring a player. On wet days and in the dark evenings a good gramophone, which would cost about twenty pounds, would be another great boon. It would play for the children's dancing or give selections at the concerts. For if once we got the instrument the parties each week would collect to buy new records. I wonder if any of the readers of these notes would like to make us a Christmas present of the whole or part of the cost, and so gladden our hearts and brighten our days when next season comes round and the inevitable proportion of wet days again raises the old question of how to interest the children. The treasurer is Mr. J. H. Pimley, 44, Bishop-street, Moss Side, Manchester. CHARLES PEACH.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Dundee.—On Friday evening, December 13, the Rev. H. Williamson presided, as hon. president of the Dundee and District Mill and Factory Operatives' Union, at their twenty-second annual festival in Kinnaid Hall. Some 1,500 members and friends were present, and Mr. Williamson, in the course of his address, pointed to the great improvement in the condition of factory workers since the establishment of that Union. It was mainly a women's union, but they felt that by helping the women they were also helping the men.

Great Yarmouth.—A successful course of special services and lectures by the Rev. John Birks has just been concluded, and a further series promised for the New Year, in response to numerous requests from many anxious to know more about the Unitarian faith.

Rawtenstall.—The annual Christmas tree was held on Saturday, Dec. 14, the proceedings being continued on the following Tuesday evening. The event coincided with the 150th anniversary of the old chapel, and many interesting reminiscences were recounted and much satisfaction expressed at the vigorous life displayed in the work of the school and church.

Stockport.—A new experiment for the Stockport Church was tried on Dec. 12 in the form of a Christmas tree fair, held in the schoolroom. Not only the large Christmas tree, reaching to the ceiling, but the room also was prettily decorated, and various stalls were arranged for the sale of small articles suitable for Christmas presents, in addition to those on the tree. It pleased the children immensely, and although only a small effort it produced about £16 for the benefit of the church funds.

God's love to us in this world is not a feeble indulgence of our inclinations and humoring of our childish desires, but it is an eternal principle. It dispenses not only smiles and gladness, but, for our good, darkness and frowns; so that we, in some of its manifestations, call it wrath, though it is still love, perfect and alone. We should pitch our affections, our esteem and effort, on the same holy key, and lift it into the same Godlike strain, as we contemplate the condition, and strive for the perfection of ourselves or our fellow-men. We should enter into the sublime sympathy with our Father in the tasks and sufferings He appoints; in the hard, long scourging He lays on the impenitent and impure, that He may open to them a better fate.—C. A. Bartol.

WHAT MEN ARE SAYING.

WHAT MEN ARE DOING.

WHAT MEN ARE THINKING.

SEE PUBLIC OPINION.

A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.

Every Friday: Twopence.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political, and social progress.

What Mr. R. B. Haldane says of "Public Opinion":—

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion," under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed of men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists, the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.—Yours faithfully,

Percy L. Parker, Esq., Office of "Public Opinion," Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

What Sir Gilbert Parker, M.P., says of "Public Opinion":—

Dear Mr. Parker,—I cannot but congratulate you on that excellent paper, "Public Opinion," which I read regularly. You have a journal of great influence and usefulness.—Yours truly,

R. B. HALDANE.

GILBERT PARKER.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to "Public Opinion," 30 and 31, Temple House, Tallis-street, London, E.C. Specimens free on application.
